SQUADRON LOG BY THE STOWAWAY

By the time recorded history begins both long ships and round ships were developed enough to be able to go where man desired. Oars were used in banks, and where more than one deck was found, banks of oars were used on each deck. Sails also were known, and were many centuries in developing to a stage useful enough to eliminate oarsmen. Sails first were used as an auxiliary power, and today, in small craft, other auxiliary power, usually an engine, is used to help out sail power.

So long as naval life remained along the coast line, oars were used and the long boat which could be drawn up on the beach remained the more important.

Very early in the story of mankind warfare at sea became one of the most important activities of national life. Round boats carrying food and goods for trading had to be protected by warvessels which acted as convoys. Tribal and national lands must be protected from invaders.

Great numbers of men were needed as oarsmen, and great numbers for fighting men. All these men of war must be fed, and it was necessary to transport food on round ships.

Records of the Peloponnesian War written in 427 B. C. showed that it cost $72,000 in present day valuation of money to maintain 200 men for a month.

In six months 250 ships and 50,000 men were needed, equivalent to the crews, today, of 50 battleships. Since each ship cost $1200, the cost of the ships alone was $300,000. In other words one man was needed for every 3-5 ton displacement of ships, while today one man is used for every 50 tons of displacement.

It was this vast expense of war fare that made necessary the improvement of sail power, and the release of man power.

Sails at first on any type of boat consisted of a single mast and one large square-sail, very much like those found on Chinese and Japanese junks today.

The first improvement was to add a top sail and a few experiments were made with an extra mast and sail. Then two sails were added to the chief or central mast with smaller fore and aft sails.

As time went on, and sailing men ventured out to sea and away from the coasts, long ships were replaced by the better sea keeping round boats. The single deep big bellied sail was broken up into numerous sails carried one above the other.

When three or more masts so equipped were added to a ship, and a jib came into use, the sides of the ship were lowered, fewer decks used and oars or galleys disappeared.

But the galley slave remains.

Often fat and forty she wedges herself into a two by twice space, and on a two burner alcohol or gasoline or kerosene stove turns out a dinner fit for the gods at the end of a long day's run.
