Byrd Expedition Fuel Unchanged By Antarctic Tests

Top), Lieut. Com. George O. Noville, executive officer of the Byrd expedition, congratulates H. I. Beadle, Tide Water chemist and engineer, on the fuel and oil supplied for the two Byrd expeditions. Chief Pilot Harold June holds samples of Tydol gasoline which flew Byrd's planes over the South Pole and through the Antarctic for 35,000 miles. (Lower left), Lieut. Com. Noville presents the only remaining can of oil to W. S. Whalen, New England Tide Water manager. This specially constructed copper can of aviation oil, cached in Little America when Byrd's first expedition returned to civilization almost four years ago, was found in perfect condition under the snow. (Lower right), H. I. Beadle, Tide Water chemist, gives gasoline an octane rating test and finds the specimens from both planes had retained their high rating and standards.

By LATTIMER SHAW

THIS story starts on the deck of the Jacob Ruppert, flagship of the second Byrd Expedition to the South Pole, at anchor at the Boston Navy Yard. Three figures crouch down under the Condor plane which flew Admiral Byrd's party through the Antarctic. Airplane mechanic Vernon Boyd, opens a valve and a trickle of gasoline flows into a retort held by H. I. Beadle, chemist and engineer of Tide Water Oil Company.

Harold I. June, chief pilot of the two Byrd Antarctic expeditions, nods his approval and corroborates the fact that this gasoline is the same that powered the plane during all its polar flights totalling more than 20,000 miles. The Condor is lashed alongside the gigantic Ford Trimotor that flew over the pole in 1929. The three men then board the Ford plane and take samples of its gasoline.

Down into the bowels of the ship they go now to inspect the remaining fuel and oil supplied by Tide Water for this as well as the previous Byrd expedition. They come on the only can of Veedol oil that is left — one of Tide Water Oil's copper cans which was specially constructed for the first Byrd expedition six years ago. It had been cached under the ice when the Byrd party left Little America after the first expedition, reclaimed by the second when the food caves were dug into, part of it used in the planes and the rest brought home.

It was turned over to Commander George O. Noville, executive officer of the expedition, who later presented it to W. S. Whalen, Tide Water's New England manager.

The next scene is in a chemical laboratory where the three men prepare to test their gasoline samples.

Chemist Beadle silently pours the gasoline for the test, and, stop watch in hand, turns wheels and dials. The next minute or two will determine whether or not the fuel was damaged or altered by being subjected to Antarctic temperatures of 65 below zero and then brought back to Boston on an afternoon when the thermometer registered 78 degrees.

Suddenly he stops the machine and walks to a nearby desk where a chart taken of the gasoline when it was consigned to the Byrd supply ships rests and compares the figures he has just taken.

His announcement is brief, merely that "The fuel is unchanged" but it means that the proper gasoline, with proper handling, can be taken anywhere, used under practically any conditions and stored for long periods without losing its caliber or stamina.

This discovery is one of the major ones developed in the automotive and aerial experiments conducted at Little America. According to Commander Noville and Mr. June, the gasoline and oil are exactly the same after their years of temperature changes as the Tydol and Veedol used today by American motorists.
