"Eat more cereals and don't worry about the waistline," says Dr. Henry C. Sherman, chief of the Bureau of Human Nutrition and Home Economics. About one-fourth more grain food with more fruits and vegetables can well be used in American wartime meals, he says, to offset reduced quantities of meat, fats, and sweets.

Seventy-five percent of the country's food production for this year has been allocated for civilian use, about 13 percent for military forces, 10 percent for lend-lease shipments, and the rest for territorial shipments and other special needs.
