FOOD FOR FREEDOM

the CONSERVATION WAY

The following article is an excerpt from "Fur Bearers Fight Axis" by Philip F. Allan which appeared in the November issue of "Soil Conservation."

The Fur-Bearing Animals have been called to the fight against the Axis. The pelts of these small residents of farm provide warm linings for gloves, hoods, vests and other apparel for the armed forces and for civilians working in arctic climates or high altitudes. The merchant marines of the United Nations are clothed in fur vests in winter. Mountain infantrymen of many nations are well-equipped for cold-weather fighting with parkas, breeches, and gloves lined with furs. Meanwhile, Hitler begs each year for fur coats to enable the Wehrmacht to face the Russian winter.

It is from the furs that the most important contribution of the muskrat, opposum, skunk, racoon, and mink comes. The 16,000,000 annualy taken provide an important, if minor, source of farm income. They the farm unsuited to the production are produced principally on parts of of cultivated crops, livestock, or timber. Marsches, ponds, srteam banks, drainage ditches, hedges, woodland borders, gullies, and rocky outcrops are the homes of Fur bearers. These areas are common nearly every farm and total more than 30,000,000 acres on griculturl land. With little or no management whatever, the five farm fur bearers are produced.

The fat from skunks, opossums, racoons, and several other animals are being added to the salvage of other fats for the production of glycerine—a step in the manufacture of nitroglycerine and other explosives.

Fur bearers are useful as food. Maryland muskrats have long been sold in Baltimore, Philadelphia, and Washington markets. The raccoon and opossum are also used for food in many sections. Several other animals, notably, jack rabbits, cottontails, squirrels, and woodchucks.

Now that fur-bearing animals are playing such an important part in the fight gainst the Axis, farmers should help these fur-bearers by providing food and homes for more of them.

The transport of gasoline is so important that tank trucks have been cut in half, flown out of this country, and welded together again at their destination.

American automobile users during 1942 cut down their consumption of gasoline by 17 per cent, according to the Public Roads Administration of the Federal Works Agency.
