Problems Of Shore Fruit Growers

Fruit and vegetable growers are invited to bring their questions on production, insects and disease control, and varieties to be answered by the panel of agricultural experts at the Peninsula Horticultural Society meetings at Salisbury, Md., Thursday and Friday, December 13 and 14 (at Fellowship Hall).

Scientists of the State Colleges of Maryland, Delaware, Virginia and the U. S. Department of Agriculture as well as guest speakers from Rutgers University in New Jersey, will be on hand to provide the most practical answers to the many problems of growing these crops.

Thursday sessions will open with discussion of the small fruit industry of the Del-Mar-Va peninsula, centering around strawberries and blueberries, followed by an afternoon presentation of the uses of DDT and other sprays and dusts in control of disease and insect pests. The annual banquet follows at 6:30 P. M.

Friday morning brings a panel talk on soils and fertilizer, covering problems with peaches, apples, tomatoes, peppers, potatoes, peas, lima beans, sweet potatoes, and strawberries. Afternoon sessions will cover labor saving machinery and farm buildings, new vegetable varieties, and root growth research with vegetable crops.
