Frequently some one will ask, "Just what do you mean by a Chiropractic adjustment?" To many persons a Chiropractic adjustment brings up the picture of rough handling. Others think of the back as such a delicate structure that a little push may distort it.

In order to make perfectly clear just what a Chiropractic adjustment is and does, it is first necessary to say a few things about that back of ours. In the first place it is strong, well protected, accurately shaped and balanced and can support heavy loads as well as severe strains. Like any other mechanical structure, it can be suddenly or accidentally overloaded. Also by being subject to a wrongful posture, kept out of equilibrium for sustained periods, will result in displacement of its vertebrae.

The exact position with relation to all the vertebrae of the spinal column must be clearly understood to determine the degree of displacement. When determined and due allowance is made for muscular re-action and other counteracting forces, the hands are placed at the particular point where the least pressure is needed to slip the bone back into normal position. This is neither painful nor unnatural. It is not massage or rubbing which may ease sore or tired muscles. It does make a mechanical change in the vertebral relationship thus removing irritation on spinal nerves.
