Hollywood . . . Long distance may make the heart grow fonder, but Ethel Merman, featured in "Anything Goes" utilized probably one of the shortest telephone lines in existence in the production of this film. Only fifty feet of wire were necessary to connect the two telephones used in the production. Miss Merman, featured in the picture with Bing Crosby, sits in a hoop of neon lights and "floats" over the heads of people in a night club. In making the film an operator with a telephone, seated on the floor of the cafe was connected with another operator located in the attic of the building completely out of sight. The floor man telephoned the upper operator, directing him where to swing the crane which placed Miss Merman properly throughout the scene. However, this was not the shortest telephone line ever used, for it was twenty feet longer than that of the original line over which Alexander Graham Bell, the inventor, and Thomas A. Watson, his assistant, held the first telephone conversation in the world, March 10, 1876.
