CHAIN STORES AID FRUIT GROWERS

The weeks beginning October 12 and October 19 were annuonced as the dates for the nationwide sales drive on California dried fruits, a movement launched by 37,000 chain stores to help a $35,000,000 industry.

"October 12 is Discovery Day, commemorating the arrival of Christopher Columbus in America," said Phillip Bancroft, chairman of the California Dried Fruit Stabilization Committee, in announcing the sales drive dates. "This year is going to be discoverey day for many an American family which hasn't known the delicious food qualities of California dried fruits. Attention of mothers and housewives will be attracted by displays of dried fruits in chain stores and we are assured that their fine food value will stimulate buying."

Bancroft's committee, composed of leading growers of the state, opened negotiations with chain store executives several months ago when it became apparent that available supplies, in view of curtailment of the export market because of unsettled world affairs, were too great to be sold at satisfactory prices without special help. Thirty thousand families depend upon the dried fruit industry and new outlets for these products became imperative.

The chain stores had helped the California canned peach industry avert a crisis last spring. Why couldn't domestic sales of raisins, figs, prune, dates and dried peaches, apricots, pears and apples be stimulated in the same manner? Accordingly, the dried fruit stabilization committee asked the chain stores to repeat the canned peach job. An immediate strengthening of the market followed the chain stores' acceptance of the committee's proposal. Carload shipments of dried fruits began to move eastward as the chain stores prepared to stock up for the drive. Newspaper advertisements were prepared and plans made for elaborate store displays. The October dates were selected because California drid fruits are at their finest in the fall. In many parts of the country the fresh fruit season is over. There's a nip in the air and the healthful heat units contained in dried fruits are appreciated by housewives who plan a balanced diet for their families.
