THE RECENT ACTIVITIES of the Kent County Watermen's Protective Association in which officials from the state marine experimental station have been invited to speak promises to help solve the seafood problem of the Chesapeake Bay. By combining experimentation with practical knowledge a great deal of practical progress can be developed. There is probably no part of the Chesapeake Bay where the seafood industry has been continually maintained than at Rock Hall and the knowledge of seafood has been handed down for generations. In this generation when everything is being done on so large a scale and the marketing of seafood is so changed the knowledge of biologists is of material value. A combining of ideas instead of bitter enmity between the theoretical and practical side of thre question promises to bring about a successful solution.
