Hail of Three Different Kinds, Authority Relates

There are at least three different kinds of icy lumps and pellets that fall from the sky, and they have all been called hail. What science regards as true hail occurs only in connection with thunderstorms, either incipient or fully developed, and therefore, chiefly in warm weather. It often falls in tornadoes, but probably only when these occur in a thunderstorm area, notes a writer in Natural History.

Hail, as thus distinguished, consists of balls or irregular lumps, each of which, on examination, is usually found to have an opaque snow-like center, surrounded by ice, which is often in alternately clear and opaque layers.

The second class of icy particles takes the form of miniature snowballs, about the size of large shot or small peas. It falls in cold weather, often in conjunction with ordinary snow. Because it readily crumbles, English-speaking meteorologists have commonly called it "soft hail"; but this term gives way to the German name "graupel."

Lastly, little pellets or angular particles of clear ice sometimes fall in cold weather. These frozen drops, though fairly common, have until recently enjoyed the distinction of being anonymous, so far as the scientific word was concerned. In the year 1916, the United States weather bureau solemnly decreed that such ice particles should be called "sleet"—a word, alas, of many meanings.

Great Chalk Formation in Mountains of Norway

Geologically speaking, Denmark owes its existence to the mountains of Norway. Every stone in Denmark once was a tourist from Norway, arriving with the glaciers on a submarine reef of chalk and lime, until in a manner similar to the building of the Newfoundland sandbanks by the icebergs from Greenland, Denmark emerged. This fact explains one of the most beautiful sights in the country—coasts of fantastic chalk formations in many places, observes a writer in the Los Angeles Times.

The grandest of these formations is Moens Klint, and described as "the gem of Denmark." This is a range of white chalk cliffs 400 feet high and about five miles in length rising straight from the sea. The top is forest clad and extends in places to deep gorges which split up the masses of chalk, making points and pinnacles of weird loveliness everywhere. It has stood for thousands of years, but from time to time large masses go back to the sea, as when the well - known "Queen's Chair" formation fell in 1868, making a temporary island off the coast about 700 feet long, which has since disappeared.

Sleep a Great Mystery

Why do we sleep? What is sleep? Science can give no definite, final answer. The mysterious processes are imperfectly understood, states a writer in Literary Digest. The body is larger, the brain smaller when we sleep. Blood vessels of the body dilate, drawing blood from the brain, which becomes relatively anemic when its owner sleeps, as has been visually observed in the cases of persons in whom skull injuries have exposed small portions of the brain.

Animal Tears

Whether animals have some inward expression of weeping is not known. Crocodile tears, however, are famous. Ancient travelers said that the saurians wept over those they devoured. The nearest approach to human crocodile tears, says Literary Digest, are the simulated sobs of professional mourners still found in some parts of Europe and the Orient. They attend funerals, follow the cortege to the cemetery, wailing or crying softly, according to their pay.
