THE SOCIAL WANDERER

In absence of our friend, the Social Wanderer, it looks as if we're going to have to do a pinch hitting job. Pinch hitting is usually confined to baseball or bridge circles, isn't it? We shall, however, apply the duty to a more novel situation, and appear nonchalant as we search frantically for something to say next. Should one pen vague phrases about rounds of parties and dances, or should one state in stolid terms such flashy bits as "Mrs. Jones visits Mrs. Brown, and a good time was had by all"?

Anyhow, despite the dilemma, one can no longer ignore the Regatta, and the abundance of sunburn, boats, and visitors it brings with it. We regret the races take such a minor position in the Regatta, but after all, who goes to boat races to watch the boats?

We have with us—

BIJOUX—

We are proud to present two bijoux from the pen of Jocelyn Branham, attractive and talented member of Chestertown's younger set. But a sample of her poetic genius is displayed in the following poems, amply assuring her brilliant future.

SAILS AND JADE

I thought that I had won him 'til I saw him by the sea,
Alight with adoration but his eyes away from me,
And settled on a cream sea, rising from a mist,
Cushioned in a soft blue and set in amethyst.
I watched his brown face lighten and his steely eyes grow soft
As a strong wind lifted and blew the flag aloft;
The ivory sails shivered and the loose ropes gave,
And I saw her lift her lovely self upon a crested wave.
Jade sea, blue prow, gold sails tightened;
Wet spray, keen wind, green wake whitened.
She turned due seaward and we watched the tops'l fade
In a soft mist of purple and an endless path of jade.

CITY—PROUD

My father says, " 'Tis finished but the paint—"
"The finest barn I ever hope to see."
And he is proud of all the work he did.
I know he wants to show the thing to me.
But, city proud, I only shrug and sigh
And maybe laugh a little at his glee.

"I feel my youth return," my mother says,
"When all about me life begins again.
"The maples will be blooming in a week
'When all their roots are moist with April rain."
And I will find new interest in a book
When Mother asks me to explore the lane.

And yet I know I shall arise tonight
To seek the beauty that the earth reveals.
And I shall breath the blackness of the air;
And gaze upon my father's barn and feel
The soft white wood that fuses with the moon
And yields the scent of pine.

And I shall steal
An hour from the night to walk the lane;
Splashing the dew-drops on my light-shod feet.
Thinking, 'In a week there will be rain
'To moisten this hard soil and reach the roots
'Of maple trees to make them bloom again.'

So, being city-proud, and vain, and you,
Ashamed to love these things by light of day.
I cannot tell them that I hold this world
Far dearer to an aching heart than they.
