ON THE SCREEN AT THE NEW LYCEUM

MAESTRO CAGNEY—Yes That's our Jimmy waving the baton in "Something To Sing About"

One night recently Bette Davis, who has seen "Of Human Bondage" a good many times, reviewed for the first time a certain scene of the old picture, which is enjoying one of its many revivals. That's the movie in which she scored such a tremendous hit, with Leslie Howard.

Hitherto the Warner Bros. star had been unable to watch that one scene. She'd get a case of the jitters just before it came on and close her eyes, clamp her hands tight over her ears. In that particular scene she had always imagined she over-acted, and she was afraid audiences would burst out laughing.

Her attendance the other night was the result of a bet made with Henry Fonda and Ian Hunter, who are playing opposite her in "That Certain Woman," her new film. She confessed to them, when she head of the latest revival of the Somerset Maughan classic, that she had always feared public ridicule for that one scene. Surely they'd laugh at it now, with the film getting oldfashioned!

Director Edmund Golding, authordirctor of the new Davis vehicle, had seen the revival and declared this wasn't so. Fonda and Hunter made the bet, and Miss Davis reluctantly agreed to "try" to view the scene, and also keep her hands off he rears, alert for audience giggles.

She kept her word. Next morning she came to the set, prepared to pay off her bets. Far from laughing at the scene, the audienc practically hissed villainous Bette, and almost wept in sympathy for hero Leslie Howard!"

"That Certain Woman" comes to the New Lyceum Theatre on Monday and Tuesday, October 11 and 12, and is said to present Bette at her best.

Quite different from the run-of-the mill type of screen musical is "Something to Sing About.," the Victor Schertzinger production in which James Gagney is starring for Grand National, coming on Wednesday and Thursday, October 13 and 14 to the New Lyceum Theatre. Perhaps, the aptist description of this latest Cagney picture would be "a comedy with music," for, primarily, it is an amusing and occasionlly sentimental tale, well told and well acted.

There is music and dancing in the picture, but these elments, which are usually dominant in screen musicals, in "Somthing to Sing About" are subordinated to the story and serve mainly to carry out the clever plot. There has been no contention, however, between the author and the composer on this ground, because they happen to be the same person—Victor Schertzinger—who wrote the original story from which Austin Parker fashioned the screenplay. He also wrote the five new songs, which are introduced in the production.

The additional circumstance that Schertzinger directed the picture, accounts for the unusually successful integration of story, songs and dances, which has been achieved in "Something to Sing About." In no instance is a song or a dance introduced merely to entertain the audience or—as so often happens—to divert attention from an inadequate plot. Instead, the songs and dances have the definite function of aiding in the unfolding of the story and thus serve to heighten the impact of the scenes in which they occur.

The star's talents as a song and dance man are a revelation to most of his admirers who, however, would resent any sacrifice of his acting genius for the purpose of exploiting his abilities as a musical comedy entertainer.

Thy find no cause for criticism on this score, however, for the story has been fashioned to include in the fullest degree those elements of forceful action, humor and charm, which have come to be associated with the name of Cagney. A gratifying surprise awaits those of his admirers, who do not know how proficient their favorite is as a dancer and singer.

Cagney sings in only one of the songs, but it seen in numerous dance numbers, four of them different routines of a highly distinctive nature. The other four songs are sung by Evelyn Daw, the 20-yar-old protege of Victor Schertzinger, who has a glorious, lyric soprano voice, and plays the feminine lead opposite the star.

The story of "Something to Sing About," sets forth in humorous, but dramatic fashion, what happens to a Broadway big-shot, when he is brought to Hollywood to be made into a motion picture star.

At the beginning of the story the hero is the leader of a famous dance band in a sumptuous New York night spot, and at the end he returns there again, richer and more famous than ever, but surfeited—not to say disgusted—with the life of a picture star. In the meantime he has been the storm center of situations which constitute a screamingly funny satire of the manner of Hollywood life and work, and the victim of high pressure publicity methods, which threaten to wreck his family life.

"Something to Sing About" is a Victor Schertzinger production, produced by Zion Myers for Grand National.
