NOW AND THEN

ASPIRE

Aspire! What ever fate befall,
Be it praise or blame—
Aspire even when deprived of all—
It is thy nature's aim
The seed, beneath the frozen earth,
When winter checks the fresh green birth,
Still yearningly aspires
With ripening desires
And in its season it will shoot.
Up into the perfect fruit
But had it not lain low,
It ne'er had learned to grow.
Aspire for in thyself alone
That power belongs of right;
Within thyself that seed is sown,
Which strives to reach the light;
All pride of rank, all pomp of place
All pinnacles that point in space
But show thee, to the spheres,
Not greater than thy peers;
But if thy spirit doth aspire
Thou riseth ever higher—higher
Toward that consummate end
When Heavenward we tend.

—Dickens

The above is one of Dickens poems. Like Scott his novels cast his poems in the shade, but some of them are still very much prized among them. "The Ivy Green." This was set to music and was a favorite song long after Dickens has passed away. Dickens also wrote many plays which he would have performed at his home. He used often to say that he would rather have been a famous actor than a writer, forgetting that an actor's work closes with his death while the writer's works go on and on.

Dickens, although he brought Gadshill, near Rochester, loved to walk the streets of London, where he used to say, he could find all of his characters.

He was very fond of children and delighted to write Christmas stories. As the holiday season arrived he would take his children to the toy shops and let them purchase anythey wanted.

Every year he made it a practice to write a Christmas story for them. "The Christmas Carol," the "Chimes" "The Cricket on the Hearth," are among those he has written for them. The author died in 1870, but his Christmas stories are read every year as that season approaches.

They will never go old.

Chestertown has a Dickens Club which meets every Tuesday evening. At these meetings they often enacts plays from the various scenes of his novels.

Last Tuesday evening the play was from "Old Curiosity shop, where Quilp, the dwarf, one of the most despicable characters, appears at his home, just as they were discussing finding his body, thinking that he was dead. As they were growing very convivial on his wine, his appearance was not hailed with delight.

Florida is having at Daytona Beach huge tanks where they are going to display the marine bottoms with the fish and all the other marine animals in their natural environment. This will be a most interesting study and scientests are looking forward to its completion with much eagerness as it will give them the means of seeing what is going on at the bottom of the sea.

James Cain who spent his youth and early manhood here, his father being the President of Washington College has written another book called "The Serenade." His first book, "The Postman rings Twice" proclaims Mr. Cain a good story writer and also "The Serenade." His picture has appeared in the magazines. It is a pity that Mr. Cain's talents do not run upon different scenes and different characters, so that his old friends could enjoy his triumphs with him.

The "Christ of the Andes" stands in the midst of the mountains firm and unyielding as ever proclaiming that as long as it last there will be peace between Argentina and Chili. The two countries were about to engage in war, then the difficulty between them was settled and they resolved to melt their cannons and other weapons and make a statue to peace. So "The Christ stands as a memorial of that peace. At first the people of Chili resented that the face of the statue was turned towards Argentino, but when told that it was because the people of that country needed watching they were satisfied.

Argentina is the mecca of the emigrant, for this country not only holds out a welcoming hand to them, but entertains them in a hotel until they can make plans to carry them into the interior where the vast pampas is waiting to be cultivated.

Dwight Moody, the great evangelist, was a most eloquent man, and thousands came to hear him. One day a minister who was in the audience called out to him that he had made eleven grammalical mistakes in his serman today. "Perhaps I have" replied, Mr. Moody, my education was very defective. But I preach the gospel any way so you go and do like wise.
