Kublai Khan Invented The New Deal

Florida Press Association Prize Editorial By John Kilgore In The Daily Democrat

There is nothing new under the sun, not even a new deal.

It has been pointed out that Joseph inaugurated policies in Egypt similar to those of the present national administration, in the control of farm commodities, for instance. Other policies now regarded as novelties may be much older than that. And it is certain that there is little in the new deal, from managed currency to direct relief that was not observed by Marco Polo in the great Tartar empire of Kublai Khan in the thirteenth century.

Do we hear of managed currency, the purchase of gold and silver by the government with paper money, the metallic base? Kublai thought of that. Says Marco: "He makes them take of the bark of the mulberry tree . . . and this they make into something resembling sheets of paper . . . the chief officer smears the seal entrusted to him with In the darkness of the night.

vermillion, and impresses it upon the paper, so that the form of the seal remains printed upon it in red; the money is then authentic . . . and indeed everybody takes them readily . . . as if they were coins of pure gold . . . Anyone who may have gold or silver or gems or pearls, by taking them to the mint shall get a handsome price for them . . . paying in this paper money." Thus did the khan store precious metals and gems as a base for his currency, which he controlled by regulating the amount issued and the prices offered for valuables.

Do we look upon social welfare investigations in order to select those worthy of relief as a new thing? Kublai had that done. For Marco tells us, "You see he causes selection to be made of a number of families in the city which are in a state of indigence, and of such families some may consist of six in a house, some eight, some of ten, more or fewer in each as it may hap, but the whole number being very great."

And what of direct relief? We read, "And each family he causes annually to be supplied with wheat and other grain sufficient for the whole year. Moreover, all those who choose to go to the daily dole at the court receive a great loaf apiece, hot from the baking and nobody is denied; for so the Lord has ordered. He also provides the poor with clothes. For he lays a tithe upon all wool, hemp and the like, from which clothing can be made; and he has these woven and laid up in a building set apart for the purpose; and as all artisans are bound to give a day's labor weekly, in this way the khan has these stuffs made into clothing for those poor families, suitable for summer or winter, according to the time of year."

Control of agricultural surpluses was easy for Kublai Khan. For, as Marco relates, "You must know that when the emperor sees that grain is cheap and abundant, he buys up large quantities, and has it stored in all his provinces in great granaries, where it is so well looked after that it will keep for three or four years. And this applies, let me tell you, to all kinds of grain, whether wheat, barley, millet, rice, panic or what not, and when there is any scarcity of any kind of grain, he causes that to be issued. And if the price of the grain is at one bezant a measure, he lets them have it at a bezant for four measures, or at whatever price will produce general cheapness; and everyone can have food in this way. And by this providence of the emperor's his people can never suffer from dearth. He does the same over his whole empire; causing these supplies to be stored everywhere, according to calculation of the wants and necessities of the people." The great traveler failed to observe that the policy of Kublai resulted, not alone in avoiding famine or extreme high price, but through the purchase of surpluses in controlling the market at a minimum, also.

Tax relief is no new thing, either. Kublai declared a moratorium in time of stress, according to Marco, who says, "Now you must know that the emperor sends his messengers over all his lands and kingdoms and provinces, to ascertain from his officers if the people are afflicted by any dearth through unfavorable seasons, or storms or locusts, or other like calamity; and from those who have suffered in this way, no taxes are collected for that year; nay, more, he causes them to be supplied with grain of his own for food and seed. And when winter comes, he causes inquiry to be made as to those who have lost their cattle, whether by murrain or other mishap, and such persons not only go scot free, but get presents of cattle. And thus, as I tell you, the Lord every year helps and fosters the people subject to him." How like a description of the relief activities carried on in our drouth stricken areas, this ancient account reads.

Public works projects are not described as such, but there is a parallel in the great projects carried on by the khan. Whether it was his design to utilize surplus labor and reduce unemployment in this manner, we cannot say, but certainly it must have had that effect.

Highways were constructed into every corner of his vast empire. These highways were "beautified" by avenues of trees which lined even the roads through unpopulated areas. Great buildings, walls, gardens, cities were made at the khan's order.

We are not sure who was the Jim Farley of that day but we learn that the khan had a splendid post system, not with ships, trains and planes, it is true, but with relays of fast horses transferring messages at designated stations so that messages were transmitted with remarkable speed.

And the khan enjoyed some advantages. True, he had a supreme court of twelve, but the justices did not declare any of his acts unconstitutional. And while he had 12,000 barons and many assistants and court officers, he had nothing even remotely resembling a congress to deal with.

AROUND THE WORLD on its ORIGINAL TRACKS!

Here's an old-time "Caterpillar" Thirty Tractor that did over 10,000 hours of drawbar work—traveled over 30,000 miles on its original tracks! According to a statement of its owners—Unz Brothers of Reddick, Illinois—this veteran Thirty has plowed over 4,000 acres, disked, planted, pulled the combine, graded roads, pulled hedge, etc., under a wide variety of farming conditions. This owner's affidavit states that total repair expense on the tracks during this tremendous term of use was only three dollars and fifty-four cents.

The new "Caterpillar" Thirty Tractor is built to do the same work as the sturdy former model of its name. In addition it's built to last longer—with better materials, vastly improved protection from dust, greater strength in track assemblies and other vital parts.

And today's "Caterpillar" Thirty gives its superior performance on low-cost tractor fuels or gasoline. If Unz Brothers' Thirty could have used distillate, it would already have more than bought itself with the difference in fuel costs!

Ask us for complete information on the new Thirty — a complete, modern 5-plow, 5-speed "Caterpillar" Tractor! No tractor built can beat it for low costs, except its companion, the Diesel RD4.
