LETTERS OF LOUIS XVI.

A monument the noblest and most durable was lately erected in France to the memory of Louis XVI. in the publication of a collection of his genuine letters; these have been republished in London, with a translation by Miss H. M. Williams. They are addressed to his ministers, his brothers, and his confidential counsellors. They contain specimens of elegant writing, of scientific composition, of political wisdom, of domestic prudence, of tender and of manly sentiment, which must greatly exalt the character of the amiable and unfortunate prince who wrote them, in the estimation of every person of worth and taste. They invest the brow of royalty with new honors. Nor is it easy to think of any thing that could more effectually tend to renew the ancient loyalty of the French towards the government and the family of their kings. We are willing to gratify the ingenious curiosity of our readers, with a few extracts from this most interesting collection.

To M. Berthier, Intendant of Paris.

Paris, October 28, 1788.

You have presented to my council of state a plan dictated by the purest philanthropy; and I approve highly the means you suggest of extirpating mendicity from my states. To render the poor useful without increasing their misfortunes, to establish places of retreat with humane regulations, and under wise direction, where the love of labor shall be encouraged, where active youth shall be occupied, and infirm old age comforted; such are the motives, and such the aim of your project. The corvee is abolished: but the highways require continual and expensive repairs: might not your hospitals of mendicants furnish workmen to mend and construct roads? I see whole armies of pioneers formed in those asylums, scouring the country, and stationed on the highways, where they will provide against accidents, and the ravages of the seasons, and maintain a free circulation throughout all France. You seem to me, however, not to have paid sufficient attention to the means the least burthensome to the people, of furnishing what is necessary for the support of your establishments in favor of mendicity. The people are already too much oppressed by taxes: must their burdens be so increased as to render unavailing the benefit of the abolition of the corvee? Let us make choice of the mode the least expensive, the most agreeable to the people, and by which the ends you propose can be accomplished, of disburdening those who pay taxes, rendering the poor useful, and keeping the roads in good repair. Your abilities, sir, will no doubt furnish you with new means; and be assured I shall second them in my council. LOUIS.

TO M. DE LEVOISIER.

March 15, 1789.

Your last experiment, sir, still excites my admiration; this discovery proves that you have enlarged the sphere of human knowledge. Your experiments on inflammable gas shew how much you are occupied by that admirable science, which every day makes new progress.

The queen, and some persons to whom I wish your experiments to be shewn, will meet at my cabinet to-morrow at seven in the evening; and you will give me pleasure by bringing me the treatise on inflammable gas.

You know, sir, how much you possess my esteem.

TO THE COUNT D'ARTOIS.

July 18, 1789, eleven in the morning.

I had yielded, my dear brother, to your solicitations, and the representations of a few faithful subjects: but I have since made some prudent reflections. To resist at present would be to risk the loss of the monarchy, and the ruin of us all. I have therefore countermanded the orders I had given: my troops will retreat from Paris; and I shall employ milder measures. Talk to me no more of an act of authority, of a great stroke of power: I believe it is most prudent to temporize, to yield to the storm, and expect every thing from time, from the awakened courage of the good, and the love of Frenchmen for their king.

TO M. VERGNIAUD.

January 19, 1792.

Your plan is sublime, sir---but it is no longer time to feign. You make propositions: and I can perform nothing. I have not even the power of convincing the world, that I have the desire of doing good. Yourself, sir, even in the supposition that I consented, have no success to hope. Crimes and conspiracies are abroad; the constitution must fall, and with it, the first public functionary whom it created. You have great and liberal ideas; but your mixed government can only last a day. The innovators propose to themselves no particular end; they aim at novelty, & will never attach themselves to any thing, but will always destroy. They would overthrow, to-morrow, the constitution they had established to-day, and the public functionaries they had had themselves made; they tend to their own destruction. We must sir, rally, sincerely round the constitution, which, perhaps, is not free from imperfections, but may serve in stormy times, as a salutary plank. Let us then unite our sincere efforts to save this constitution.

Paris, August 12, 1792, 7 in the morning.

"My Brother,

"I am no longer king! The public voice will make known to you the most cruel catastrophe—I am the most unfortunate of husbands and of fathers! I am the victim of my own goodness, of fear and of hope. It is an impenetrable mystery of iniquity! They have bereaved me of every thing: they have massacred my faithful subjects; I have been decoyed by stratagem far from my palace; and they now accuse me! I am a captive; they drag me to prison; and the queen my children, and madame Elizabeth, share my sad fate.

"I can no longer doubt that I am an object odious in the eyes of the French, led astray by prejudice. This is the stroke which is most insupportable. My brother, but a little while and I shall exist no longer. Remember to avenge my memory, by publishing how much I loved this ungrateful people. Recall one day to their remembrance the wrongs they have done me, and tell them I forgave them. Adieu, my brother, for the last time!
