Mr. SELFRIDGE'S CASE.
From the Post folio.
Hitherto we have preserved a profound silence on this subject; for we deemed it highly improper, pendente lite, either to examine the law relative to homicide, or to relate the circumstances which attended the catastrophe. It is, however, by no means as unwarranted to state exculpatory circumstances, pending a prosecution, as it is those which tend to criminate. In the former case, we do but concur with the presumption of law, which supposes every man innocent until he is convicted of guilt; in the latter case, we violate a principle, essential to the existence of civil liberty, by preoccupying the public mind, and defeat the benignant provisions of the common and statute laws of the country.
The democratic presses unanimously pursued a course, opposite to that, which we adopted as the rule of our conduct. They exerted all their influence, from the first moment of Mr. Selfridge's confinement, till his final deliverance. Mr. Selfridge neither replied to his enemies, nor a peace to the justice or compassion of his friends.

No federal paper ever pursued an individual after a fair and honorable acquittal, by a miscellaneous pannel. Mr. Selfridge did not challenge a single political adversary on the jury. Nothing can more strongly evince the proud confidence which he felt in his own innocence. We do not hesitate to declare, in the most unqualified manner, that the life of no gentleman in our country, since the revolution, has been put in more imminent peril by extra-judicial means. Never before has the liberty of the press been employed to invade the jurisdiction of the courts of justice. The report of the trial, and Mr. Selfridge's own defence, are both in the hands of the public; and we will now essay a brief compendium of the whole transaction.

Mr. Selfridge was applied to, professionally, by a publican, to institute a suit against Mr. Austin and two other persons, who composed a democratic committee of arrangements, and who furnished a dinner upon Cap's Hill on the 4th of July; the committee not being willing to pay the in-keeper the sum which he demanded. The conduct of Mr. Selfridge on this occasion was highly creditable to himself. Although he was offered the demand by the publican for less than his moiety; by which he would have gained a hundred pounds or more, he absolutely declined to purchase it, alleging "that every honest man at his face against such practices," and advised the innholder to settle the demand himself, or to submit it to reference. After much more delay, than professional gentlemen usually give, a suit was commenced; soon after which, a settlement took place. The malicious Federalists became acquainted with the facts, and were so outrageous as to laugh at, and despise the contemptible meanness of the committee.
Mr. Austin was undoubtedly galled at these guips and quips, and rather bullets of the brain: He declared to Mr. Babcock, one of his own party, "that Selfridge had refused the suit," and he used similar expressions of the "Federal lawyer" who filled the writ; and declared if it had not been for such disgraceful interference, no difficulty would have ensued. These declarations having come to the knowledge of Mr. Selfridge, he called on Austin, who gave him no satisfaction. The next day he sent Austin a polite note by a friend, requesting him to have the goodness to do him the justice to enter his protest against the falsehood, which he had circulated relative to his professional conduct, in the cause above alluded to. Although Austin acknowledged that he had propagated the story, he refused to retract it. After much shuffling and many prevarications by Mr. Austin, Mr. Selfridge wrote him a second note, couched in very caustic terms, and which would have probably terminated in an affair of honor, had not the better part of Mr. Austin's valour consisted in discretion.
One of two alternatives was peremptorily demanded by Mr. Selfridge. Either that he should acknowledge in writing the falsehood which he had propagated, or give up the name of his author. These reasonable and pacific terms were refused; and the cal-lumnies were still circulating, to the great detriment of Selfridge. After the lapse of two or three days, Mr. Selfridge posted Austin in the Boston Gazette, as "A LIAR, A COW-ARD, and a SCOUNDREL," alleging in his note his reasons for so doing. On the same day, Austin instigated his son, a vigorous, athletic young man, about nineteen years of age, to beat Selfridge on the public exchange.
Armed with a club, he sallied out to meet, as he supposed, his married adversary. The moment he saw Selfridge, without giving any notice, he ran upon him with his uplift-ed bludgeon, with a degree of violence which denoted an intention of depriving Selfridge of the power of resistance by the force of his first blow. The weapon was a 9 ounce hickory cane, selected that morning for the purpose. The first blow across Selfridge's head, was so powerful as to break through a "stiff fur hat," and inflicted a wound so severe, that his surgeon declared "it might have been attended with fatal consequences." The assailant was repeating his blows, when Mr. Selfridge, with all possible dexterity, took a pistol from his side pocket, and by discharging it, put a period to the existence of his opponent. Mr. Selfridge immediately and voluntarily surrendered himself into the hands of justice; he submitted to his fate with manliness, and he has surmounted his difficulties with honor. The laws of his country, not from any failure of testimony; not from any lack of asperity in his prosecutor; not from any predominance of party spirit; but from the immutable principles of justice, have pronounced him innocent, and have justified his deed. In the rectitude of this decision, after a careful perusal of the report of the trial, we heartily accord; and it is our unalterable opinion, that the blood of an imprudent son lies at the door of a wicked father.
