NUISANCE.
IS it possible that health-officers can pass along Sharpe-street, without noticing that a bominable Nuisance on the west side of said street, between Conway and Barré-streets? It is the opinion of the people who live in that part of the city, that it is not possible for any of these gentlemen to pass along without noticing it; for it requires no spectacles, nor even natural eyes, if the nose be sound, to discover the Nuisance alluded to—And it is further believed, that if there were such a Nuisance adjacent to the dwellings of the health-officers, it would soon be removed; for it is reasonable to suppose, that they have more feeling for themselves and families than what they have for their fellow-citizens, as they have in vain been applied to for redress. It is true those gentlemen called health-officers have ordered a few persons of lower circumstances to fill in their lots, so as to carry the water out into the street, and which was immediately complied with; but why not those of more wealth, where there is ten times more necessity, which if not done shortly, must inevitably destroy the health of a number of families in that part of the city.

AMERICAN BIOGRAPHY.
Died, at Calcutta, on Tuesday evening the 23d Sept. 1806, JAMES MURRAY, esq., late major in the service of Holkar. He was a most amiable man, and an intrepid soldier. He had, during a long career of honorable service, acquired a handsome fortune, and was on the eve of his departure to his native land, to enjoy in dignified repose the hard-earned fruit of his dangers and toils.
But, alas! Death, whom he had so often faced, and never feared, by a sudden and unexpected attack on him, cut him off in the prime of his days; and on Wednesday morning he was committed to the silent grave, a melancholy instance of the vanity of human expectations, possessions and honors. Some of his late companions in arms attended his funeral and bedewed his sod with manly tears, warm from congenial and affectionate hearts.
Major Murray was a native of North-America. The ships of the United States laying in the river had their flags hoisted half mast, during the day as a tribute of respect to the memory of their brave countryman.

The following circumstances relating to this gentleman have been communicated to the editors of this Gazette for publication, by a gentleman who arrived here in the Juliana from Calcutta.
"Major Murray was a native of the state of Rhode-Island: his real name was Lilli-bridge; why he assumed the name of Murray is not known. At an early age he left his relations in consequence of some ill treatment he had received from some one of them, and went to sea, after a number of voyages he arrived at Tranquebar on the coast of Coromandel about the year 1790, where he formed the resolution of going into the interior for the purpose of entering into the service of some one of the petty princes, who at that time were particularly desirous of having Europeans as officers, to command their troops. This resolution he accomplished in company with another person, (whose name is not known) with some difficulty, as they had to pass the posts then possessed by the English, who were extremely vigilant to prevent Europeans going into the country. The life which Lillibridge now led required a constitution as robust as he possessed, an invincible courage, and a presence of mind which no danger could dispel. It is well known what species of petty warfare has for many years existed almost unremittently in the vast peninsula of India: the continued jarring of interests, the jealousy of various small powers of each other, joined with the intrigues of the Europeans who have alternately held possessions on the coast, have made that unhappy country the seat of rapine, desolation and war. It was in the service of the Maharrattas that Lillibridge became noted for his superior bravery. With these people he continued nearly 15 years, travelling the country from Cape Comorin to the frontiers of Persia. In the service of Holkar, the celebrated chief of the Maharrattas, Lillibridge, who was now called Murray, became first known to the British, by saving, at the most eminent hazard of his own life, the lives of some of their officers who had fallen into Holkar's hands, and who had ordered them to be put to the sword. It was shortly after this business that he quitted the service of Holkar, and raised a number of cavalry in his own name, with which he took possession of a district of country.
Before he attained this, he had experienced every reverse that such an undertaking could be subject to, being at one time at the head of only 7 or 8 men not more than half armed.
When the war broke out between the British and Scindeah, in which Holkar assisted the latter, Murray immediately possessed the British government in the part of the country where he was, and joined lord Lake with about 7000 horse. It was at that period that marquis Wellesley issued the proclamation recalling all British subjects from the service of the native princes, under the penalty, in case they did not come in, of being treated as traitors, should they afterwards be made prisoners. Murray could not be estimated as one included in the proclamation, which by those whom it did include, and who could escape from their different situations, was immediately obeyed.
Several in the service of Holkar, who were so unfortunate as not to get away, were murdered by him.

"Murray, coming in under different circumstances from the others, was treated by the British general with greater consideration; and there was seldom a dangerous service in which he was not employed—remaining still with the command of the cavalry he brought with him. At the siege of Bhurpore, where the British army lost nearly 10,000 men, in four attempts to storm, Murray was in continual action, and obtained the character of the best partisan officer in the army. Holkar was outside of the British with seventy or eighty thousand horse, and the signal of assault on the fortress by the British, was the signal for the attack on the outside. The events of that siege are but little known, as the British kept them secret. It was certainly a most bloody business, and shewed but little generalship, or even common sense, on the part of lord Lake."
"At the conclusion of the war, Murray, who had accumulated a handsome fortune, determined on returning home, and for this purpose remitted his funds to Calcutta, and repaired there himself. He was but little satisfied with the rewards he had met from the British government in India, for services which were certainly of eminent utility. He had been made a nominal major in the service, and received permission to return to America, with half pay. He declared to the writer of these particulars, that it was his intention to return again to India, if he could get a few brave fellows to join him; a few such, landing on an unfrequented part of the coast, and getting into the interior among the Maharrattas, would be sufficient to shake the British empire in India to its centre. It is to the character of this man and two or three other Americans who have signalized themselves in India, that we owe the honor of being included in the treaties between the British government and Scindeah and Holkar, by one of the articles of which, the two latter expressly stipulate to engage no Americans in their service.
"A few days before Murray was to embark for America, a fall from his horse caused an intestinal rupture, which, being certainly treated, ended in a mortification in his bowels, and in death.
"Major Murray was of middling stature,
