

Prospectus of A New WEEKLY PAPER, ENTITLED, THE PEOPLE'S MONITOR.

To be published at Boston, Maryland,
By MICHAEL PINKIN.

THE title which the Editor thus assumes for his projected publication, may perhaps induce an imputation of vanity and presumption, of which, indeed, he is far from being possessed. By those, however, whose favor he is most anxious to engage, in the outset of a doubtful and difficult career, he will not be misunderstood. They well know, that for the support of such a paper as he proposes to issue, he must look to the wise and the learned, and hold out a convenient receptacle for the fruits of their experience and knowledge.

But, however humble his personal pretensions may be to the capacity of fulfilling the extent of engagement into which this title would seem to commit him, he will not hesitate to declare, that he intends, on all proper occasions, to exercise the privilege of a citizen and an Editor, by expressing, in the best and most forcible manner he is capable, his own opinions of public men and measures. The Editor, feeling, with the deepest regret, the deficiency of his early instruction, has, in the intervals of mechanical toil, heretofore labored to improve every moment to catch a glimpse of the great light of knowledge, and endeavored, with the most anxious care, to form an acquaintance with the history and political institutions of his country. Such degree of knowledge as he has been able to attain, has at least, he trusts, been sufficient to inspire him with a love of virtue and his country, and a sincere admiration of that system of republican government which has been planned and transmitted to us by the illustrious patriots of the Revolution. To guard and preserve the temple of liberty, which they erected, from the rude hand of open violence, and to screen its altars from the profanation of the ambitious, requires the constant and watchful care of every votary of the Goddess. The Editor, in no affected strain, avows an enthusiasm in the cause of the liberties of the people, and is desirous to devote himself to their service in any honorable way in which he might hope to be useful.

To conduct a vehicle, by which shall be conveyed to them, not only a knowledge of their rights, but the earliest intimation of any encroachments upon them, will be to him a proud employment, and a most grateful task. Prone as man is to ambition, and to a desire of self-aggrandizement, a constant and unrelenting watchfulness is necessary, on the part of the people, towards those in whose hands are placed the power and strength of the nation for the general protection and promotion of the common welfare. To guard against every encroachment, and to detect every aberration from duty, the Press is justly and universally esteemed the most powerful and efficient engine. The influence of political newspapers, in giving a tone to the popular sentiment, has almost established it as a maxim, that public opinion is in a state of equal subjection to the press. Hence the far famed liberty of the press derives its chief sanction, and hence the necessity that the press should adhere in all its publications to truth, and to the dispersion of those principles alone which are morally and politically correct.

Newspapers, avowedly established for the purpose of disseminating party principles and systems, become the pest and scourge of society. They are the hirelings of defamation, and the pernicious engines of faction and corruption. What salutary aid can the mind of man derive from publications, whose aim is, in spite of the common sense and common experience of all, boldly to impress it with the conviction that all orthodoxy is centered in one set of men, and all heresy in another? whose sole object is an equally indiscriminate exaltation of favorites, and depression of those who dare to dissent from their doctrines? whose authors traitorously desert the cause of the people, of truth and of good government, for the ignoble purposes of strengthening certain partisans in power? The nicely balanced parts of a republic, resting on the voice of the people as its basis, cannot long endure so dangerous an establishment. The political existence of a people, which depends upon virtue, upon wisdom, and withal, upon a firm, indissoluble union, cannot withstand the workings of so destructive an agent.

At no period in the history of our country did the times more imperiously demand the institution of a press, which, founded on strong republican principles, and elevated above the infectious atmosphere of party spirit, should present to the public attention, a candid view of affairs, and a manly expression of liberal and enlightened opinions, inducing by every exertion, a recurrence to first principles, and directing every effort to bring about an union of those men, of whatever party, who really wish well to their country, and who, fearing the ill effects, and unwilling longer blindly to pursue the plans of party spirit, wish to stop before they go too far, and adopt a more safe, just, and a wiser rule of conduct. Where men are free to think and act, an honest difference of opinion may be expected to arise, dictated by the best aids of the understanding, and sanctioned on both sides, by sentiments of patriotism and general philanthropy. It is not then, a candid difference of opinion that creates unworthiness, but the bigoted pursuit of that opinion, pronouncing every dissenter impious, and every non-conformist to its tenets an enemy to the citizens and the state.

The distinguishing characteristics of a free-man under a republican form of government, are the rights of enjoying, and the unrestrained expression of his opinions. To be robbed of the one, or checked in the exercise of the other, ought justly to be considered as the most grievous oppression. If a party were to proclaim that all those who differed in opinion from them should be deprived of the right of suffrage, or the possession of property, the open avowal of such a sentiment would manifest all the passions of opposition and produce general commotion. Yet the intolerance of party spirit, by secret agency and latent means, effects the same object without incurring a similar risk. Whenever experience and observation proclaim it as an established truth, that none but men of a particular party or sect are admitted to the participation of the public confidence and trust, it acts as a bribe to corrupt public opinion, and deprives the citizen of his independence, and with it his integrity. Once let the pretensions of worth and merit be discarded, and let it be established as a principle that popular confidence and civil trust are the certain rewards of a secretary, and a conflict instantly arises between ambition and independence, which never fails to terminate in the servile surrender of the latter.

Aided by these lights, which the observation of facts and the experience of past times have furnished, it is proposed to establish a press for the purpose of giving a more extensive range to republican principles; to produce an increased ardor in the public feeling towards free government, and to reprobate the folly and vice of the party enthusiasm and intolerance.

tolerance. The people at large engaged in the various avocations of life, have neither the leisure nor the means of obtaining a minute knowledge of public affairs. Those amongst them, who, more fortunate than the rest, have it in their power to acquire correct information, do not, perhaps, find it their interest to disseminate it amongst their fellow citizens. Thus, instead of a just and correct view of things, the people too frequently are either wholly uninformed, or, if they have received any impressions on political subjects, they have been derived from those heralds of misrepresentation which every where infest the country, and from the unprincipled calumnies of party writers. To correct this enormous evil, to relieve the minds of the people from the abominable shackles of party spirit, and to afford them an unimpaired medium, through which they may view the real state of things, and be enabled to judge fairly of the conduct of their rulers, the proposed establishment has been contemplated.

The Editor offers to his fellow-citizens, a weekly paper, adapted to their leisure and their purses, which he will conduct with the best exertion of his humble talents, and with the most zealous care and attention. The earliest statement shall be made of the measures and conduct of our public functionaries, in the state government as well as in the government of the union, upon every case which may be supposed materially to concern the rights or interests of the people. The proceedings of the state legislature and of congress together with the most important and interesting debates, shall be regularly given as they occur. All momentous foreign intelligence, when it becomes disentangled from contradiction, and appears sufficiently authenticated, shall be inserted in a concise manner. For the instruction and amusement of the reader, will be introduced all such tracts, essays, and sketches on every subject of useful and ornamental science, as the genius of correspondents, or the industrious research of the editor, may furnish. On points of honorable controversy, from which pleasure or improvement may be derived, between men of sense and decorum, he will always delight to be the organ of their arguments and opinions: but he most explicitly declares his determination not to devote his pages to the admission of anything like scurrility or personal abuse, and uniformly to refuse a place, to the malignant effusions of defamatory scribblers.

Under the pressure of absolute necessity, the Editor, a short time ago, formed the determination to quit his native state, and seek, in Philadelphia, a more permanent support. In this pursuit he has been as successful as he could have hoped: but, separated from his friends, and estranged from the scenes & objects of his early attachment, he cannot feel the tranquility or contentment in a situation where he can hope for little more than the means of ordinary support. He is also free to confess that his mind is not void of honest ambition, and that it prompts him to seek a sphere for the exertion of his humble talents somewhat more extended than the mere mechanical department of his profession, to which he has been bred. If, then, he shall receive, in his new design, the patronage and support of his fellow-citizens of the eastern shore of Maryland, and particularly of his own county, he will have cause to feel a manifold attachment to his native state, and be bound to them by the strongest ties of gratitude.

But it may, perhaps, be deemed by some persons necessary, that the Editor should here make a particular confession of his own political faith. Short as has been the course of his observation, it has been sufficient to convince him that true patriotism and a disinterested regard to the interests of the people, are not always to be found where the pretensions to them are most loudly claimed. When he looks abroad to other countries, and views, in a brief retrospect, the changes, the revolutions, and the usurpations which have taken place in the present age; when he sees too, that the cloak of liberty has been so frequently thrown about the horrors of tyranny; and then, when he turns his mind inward to his own country, and reviews the history of its parties, its party professions, and its party measures, he hesitates, nay, he will forever refuse to give his implicit confidence to any set of men who may be in the administration of public affairs. He can only promise to approve and applaud when his judgment discovers to him the interests of the people promoted by their measures; and he must be equally allowed to condemn when he perceives their rights violated, or the public welfare neglected. Were the Editor, however, to say that he has never made a choice between the conflicting parties of the times, it would not be true: but, while he has given way to a predilection which was the honest suggestion of his serious and candid opinion, and which party contesting; and, in the spirit of a patriot, he would be ever willing to relinquish the hope of personal preferment, which a servile devotion to a party might induce him to foster, for the more honorable desire to divert the public mind from a path which must terminate in ruin. Let the most enlightened statesmen of the present or past ages be consulted—let the faithful pages of history be resorted to on the question of causes which have produced the downfall of every popular government which has heretofore existed, and they will answer, party spirit and faction.

With this answer, the great oracle of human wisdom before his eyes, and with a mind not yet vitiated by the intolerance of party warfare, the editor wishes to establish a free Press, which shall invite to it the patronage & support of every man in the community, who acts and thinks with independence, and who adopts sentiments and opinions from other and far worthier motives than mere personal aggrandizement. He wishes to call to his aid the talents, the wisdom, the powers, and the exertions of all who love their country; and who, without a humble reference to what may be the party politics of the day, desire to bring into her service all good men and true; to harmonize the public mind; to banish discord & jarring wrangles from amongst us; to approve and applaud now in our public councils; to emancipate merit from the shackles of odious distinction, and to give to our great and beloved country the best services of her best citizens.

A WORK THAT OUGHT TO BE IN POSSESSION OF EVERY MAN

THE LIFE OF GEN. WASHINGTON.

By JOHN MARSHALL, Chief Justice of the United States.

Complete in 5 vols. 8vo. with an elegant Portrait, and a variety of Maps is now ready for subscribers, and for sale, by GEORGE HILL.

The following remarks from a late London publication, attest the high opinion entertained of this authentic and interesting work: "The public will learn with interest that the literary monument which has long been projected to the memory of the most illustrious character of modern times, is at length completed. No apology can be required for erecting such a monument to him who was the first in war, the first in peace, and the first in the hearts of his fellow citizens: to him who was the founder of a great and prosperous empire, and whose moderation and pure patriotism challenge the imitation of all statesmen. This performance of Judge Marshall has already been distinguished by the most honorable and unequivocal testimonies; it has been hailed as an acquisition to standard literature; and it has been considered as deserving, in point of execution, a place by the side of Robertson's Charles the Fifth, and as unrivalled in the authenticity of its materials, by any work in the entire compass of history and biography."
