CHARLESTON, August 26.
We are informed that general Pinckney, with colonel Stevens, Rutledge and Roper, and majors Ward and Howard, went on Monday last to Fort Johnson, to visit the Engineer, Captain Macomb, who arrived a few days since from Rocky Mount, agreeably to the invitation of the committee of the citizens. The Engineer communicated very freely with his visitors on the subject of fortifying our harbor; he has written to the secretary of war advising him of its defenceless state; and as arrangements have not yet been made for executing his plans of permanent fortifications, he will immediately have some temporary works thrown up, which will secure us against any sudden attacks. The military agent, lieutenant Roberts, is engaged in collecting materials for fortifications at Forts Johnson, Moultrie and Pinckney. As captain Macomb is an officer of much science and activity, strongly disposed to meet the wishes of the citizens of Charleston, and will be benefited by the talents and experience of our distinguished veteran and patriot gen. Pinckney, we may confidently hope, and expect, that our harbor will soon be in a respectable state of defence. A supply of powder and a further supply of cannon, muskets and military stores was yesterday received from Washington.

From the CHARLESTON COURIER.

On the Treatment of Persons Struck with Lightning.

The physician who attended Thos. Jones, the unfortunate man (belonging to the custom-house) mentioned in the Courier of the 8th inst. to have been struck with lightning during the last thunder storm, is happy in giving publicity to the following treatment, which was employed in that instance, with the most unequivocal and decided effects; as it confirms, under some modification, the practice which has before been recommended to notice, and from its simplicity may at all times be readily and conveniently used.

Such, however, are the varying phenomena attending this awful occasion, that a change of treatment from what is here advised, may often be necessary. From this consideration it is presumed and hoped that professional advice and assistance will never be neglected, when the same can be promptly obtained.

As early as possible after the accident the body is to be drenched with water, which must be poured on the head and dashed on the breast, back, &c. The extremities and body must next be industriously rubbed for some time; pungents, as hartshorn, &c. must next be applied to the nostrils, which may also be stimulated with feathers dipped in the same, and air may in some cases be blown into the nostrils. If there should be no appearance of resuscitation, the application of water and friction, &c may be repeated. As soon as the pulse is discovered, increased warmth, and symptoms of returning life, blood should be taken, if from a plethoric or gross subject, in both arms and to the quantity of at least one pint. When the more alarming symptoms are removed, solutions of Glauber salts in sufficient quantity will be proper. The extreme thirst which attends in these cases, when recovering should be gratified with first a few drops of hartshorn and water, and afterwards copious draughts of water or any other drink which the patient may desire.

This treatment has in the above instance most happily succeeded. The patient was for about one hour perfectly insensible, and life appeared almost extinct. Water and frictions, &c. were used in succession until a convulsive motion of the limbs and rigors were observed and were the first symptoms of returning life. On continuing the above remedies, at the expiration of an hour and a quarter he was so far recovered as to raise his hand, which he applied to the crown of his head, and soon after began to speak incoherently, complained that his skull was broken and of a most violent pain in his head and back, but continued delirious for more than eight hours, which at length completely yielded to blood letting and phlebotomy.

He is now quite recovered, the pain in his head almost entirely removed—and he is anxious to prosecute his business. On interrogating him—he is not in the least conscious of what had happened to him.

The application of water may possibly conduct off some of the electric matter with which the body is so highly charged; and it is also more than probable that it acts by suddenly reducing that very excited state of the system, which is prostrated, by the sudden abstraction of excitement, a due surface for action is accumulated. When frictions and stimulants are useful and will resuscitate, but as an inordinate action of the vital powers will then succeed, blood-letting, &c. will be generally necessary.
