APOLLO'S FOUNT.

FROM THE MARYLAND GAZETTE.

Mr. GREEN—The following song, composed in honour of the arrival in this city of our highly distinguished and much revered visitor, Gen. LAFAYETTE, is deservedly entitled to the warmest enlogy, since it exhibits an effusion of poetical imagery unsurpassed by any production, whether prosaic, or metrical, that has been elicited by the visit of the "Nation's Guest" to united America. Truly has the muse propitiously aided the invocations of the bard, by enabling him to present to the nation the only composition that can come in competition with the soul thrilling and patriotic song of Hail Columbia.

BRAVE SOLDIER OF FAME.

A NATIONAL SONG.

The God of Creation hath called forth the morn,
Auspiciously bright—by his sovereign decree
All nature rejoices—the night that is gone
Seem'd impatient to usher the day we now see:
A day most sublime—for the light never broke
To illumine a scene more transcendently grand;
It gives us a chief who from Britain's stern yoke,
With heroes departed, enfranchised our land.

Full of honours and years, he is spared by his God,
To visit the home of the happy once more,
The path of his glory triumphantly trod,
With Victory perched on the standard he bore—
Invited he comes mid the shouts of a world,
The shouts of ten millions who gladden our clime—
"The star spangled banner" so proudly unfurl'd
The page of his glory immortal as time.

Come forth gallant freemen! Come forth in your glory!
Rush forward—rush forward, to greet our lov'd Guest,
Whose name and whose deeds, are resplendent in story,
Of all living heroes the purest, the best!
Come forth lovely woman! Come forth in your beauty!
To the scene of enchantment embelishment lend.
Oh, you are foremost in virtue and duty,
Urge forward to welcome a father and friend.

To the land of the free, a hero has come,
Whose glory will triumph o'er ages unborn:
'Till all that is mortal shall sink in the tomb—
'Till time shall be lost in eternity's dawn.
Brave warrior of France! Brave Soldier of Fame!
The millions of freemen who welcome thee here,
With fondest devotion will hallow thy name,
While virtue is valued, and freedom is dear.

Ye worthies, who slumber in glory's bright grave,
Who for honour, for country, for liberty bled,
Your sons from the chains of a despot to save,
Before whom oppression and tyranny fled:
Look down sainted spirits! look down and approve
The homage we heap upon Gallia's brave son!
Who soon will be summon'd to meet you above,
To receive the reward which his virtues have won.

Ye sons of brave chiefs, to whose valour we owe
The blessings which make us the pride of the earth;
Remember the warrior who vanquished your foe;
Who conquer'd to rescue the land of your birth;
Remember this friend, for immense is your debt—
Your freedom he won you with treasure and toil:
Can the bard be ungrateful, or ever forget,
The kind benefactor who visits their soil?

"A cap by night—a stocking all day." Pope

Mr. Printer.—I have the misfortune to be very poor, and very vain; but by that happy system of compensation which equalizes, in every station, the good and ill in human life, I happen to be at the same time very ingenious. I set out in life with a determination of making a show, and I have hitherto succeeded; though there has been a perpetual conflict between my poverty and my invention—like the strife of light and darkness in the mythology of the ancient Persians. I cannot stop to relate all that I did, and suffered, and devised in my youth and early manhood, though I have many ridiculous adventures laid up in memory. I must even omit the taffety jacket and silk stockings, which I owned in partnership with six other apprentices, and which have many a time done duty on seven distinct bodies, at the self-same ball—the President of the club, for the time being, always having the privilege of dancing the last voluntary, and gallanting the young ladies home. But I pass by the happy period of youth, when even folly sits graceful, and come at once to the expedients and cares of mature age—to domestic scenes which will commend themselves at once to every man's business and bosom. I think that is the expression of my Lord Bacon.

Yesterday, Mr. Printer, was a day of difficulty, distress, and triumph. I declare to you honestly that I overcame more appalling obstacles than Napoleon encountered in his retreat from Moscow; and I am conscious of no vanity in placing myself above him, in the science of tactics. But you shall hear.

It was determined in the domestic conclave, some ten days ago, that I should give a dining party, and my wife a jam; and to save expense, it was resolved that both should take place on the same day. This would prevent the gentlemen from sitting too long at their wine after dinner, and would also save something in the evening's refreshment—to say nothing of the eclat of two parties on one day. Yesterday was the appointed day—"big with the fate of Cato and of Rome."

As a preliminary to her party, my wife, who observes all the forms of society, examined her account of calls, and resolved to make a general payment, that she might be in debt to no one, when her invitations should go out. But as many of her acquaintance might possibly not be at home, it was necessary to have a supply of visiting cards, and her pack was nearly exhausted!

"But though pleasure she was bent
She had a saving mind."

The younger children were therefore sent out to visit their playmates, in the families on which she was in the habit of calling, and they were directed to keep an eye on the card racks, and if they chanced to see one of their mother's cards, they were to exclaim—"Oh there is one of mamma's cards! that belong to me,"—and immediately to pocket it. The plan succeeded to admiration—in the course of the week, fifty-five cards were collected by the children, which were all distributed again by their mother in the course of a few hours.

Having no man servant in the family, and being unwilling to hire a messenger, I stripped off my coat, put on my wife's Leghorn flat without the ribbons, and sallied forth in the dark, to deliver our invitations in person. I believed escaped without detection; though one gentleman, [he dined with me yesterday,] while I was standing at his door, requested me to get him a bucket of water, and then with a queer look, put a fourpence half-penny in my hand. It was all clear gain; and every wise man knows the value of a fourpence half-penny.

On the great day, our drawing room was decorated with the spoils of all the chambers. Our best bed curtains were very adroitly twisted into hangings for the windows; while six chairs tied together and covered with pillows, and enveloped in a large counterpane, made an excellent sofa. The coverlet of the infant's crib, with my little daughter's sampler pinned on the centre, was called for the day, a hearth rug. A pile of books and papers on the mantle, served at once to display my love of literature and to apologize for the want of more appropriate ornaments. The genius of my wife never appeared more triumphant than in the proper disposition of lights and shadows on this important occassion. Every thing was in keeping, as the Painters say; and though the room was somewhat dark, it looked rich and mellow like an old picture.

The dining parlour was somewhat more difficult to manage. It took two-thirds of my counter to make a dining table; and my counting-room desk, though rubbed with wax, and placed in a corner, a little out of sight, made but a sorry sideboard. But then the closet door was left a jar, and my grandmother's pewter dishes and two or three or milk measures well rubbed, made rather a splendid show of family plate, of which we did not fail to talk during dinner. We borrowed chairs enough from our neighbours, under pretence of having a funeral for a cousin of one of domestics, who had just died of the yellow fever. This report in the neighbourhood kept away impertinent visitors. My eldest son blacked his face a little and attended at table, and performed his part very well. The guests were told that he had gone to college. I was however a little disconcarted by my second daughter, who thoughtlessly called him "Brother," as he was pouring out a glass of water for her: but I turned it off well enough, by remarking that if it were not for the difference of complexion, there might be some likeness between them. Accidents will happen in the best regulated families; and I did not observe that any of the guests took notice of the unlucky expression. At least, they said nothing.

As I reserved my shirt for the evening party, I buttoned up my coat and tied a black handkerchief round my neck, and endeavoured to look as fierce as a Turk. A blessing on those black handkerchief, they save an infinite number of shirts. My eldest daughter who prides herself in her fine shape, and who usually laces herself to the size of an Alderman's thumb, unluckily strained her garments too much, and while the Company was assembling, burst out on either side just under the arm. Here was distress indeed! It was her only gown. But let no man despair. Genious will conquer Fortune. After examining it a few minutes, my wife directed her to place her arms close to her side in parallel lines—to sit upright—and complain of dyspepsia. This manœuvre had the desired effect; nothing at table could tempt her to eat, or even to raise her hand to her lips. "She sate like patience on a monument," and never moved her elbows' till half past twelve at night.

But the dinner! Mr. Printer—I despair of doing it justice. My wife is an excellent cook, and can set at fault the most discriminating palate. The soup was excellent; and as well as I could learn, was composed of sorrel, burdocks, egg-shells, and chicken's feet—seasoned with mint and garlick from the garden—I verily believe the whole cost of two tureens of it, exclusive of fuel did not exceed a cent and a half. But I will not attempt to describe the particulars of the feast. There are mysteries in cookery, which like those of the Roman Bona Dea, none but females are permitted to know. I shrewdly suspect however that all these wild meats were hunted on our own territory. We had a racoon pye, which my wife and daughter commended with great zeal to the company, but did not taste themselves. I have not seen our yellow cat these three days. And then the pastry of grey squirrels—I caught two large wharf rats in a trap last Thursday, and Heaven knows they were grey enough.

I felt most anxious about my wine. I had no decanters and therefore covered my table with black bottles. But I took care to envelope the bottles with a little soot and cobweb, which passed very well for the collection of twenty years; and I had sifted the sweeping of all the grocers shops for decayed corks, which corroborated the story well enough. As to the liquor itself, not one of the company professed to know precisely of what vineyard, or vintage it was the product; but as I assured them it was very old, they agreed pretty unanimously that it was rare wine, but had lost a little of its flavour.

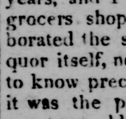

I have no time for further particulars at present, or to give you an account of the evening party. But the grand fact which I wish to communicate is this—that I have given a sumptuous dinner to twenty gentlemen, and my wife has had a splendid party of one hundred ladies, all which, through our good management cost only three dollars twenty seven cents and a half.

Yours, JOSIAH FROGNALL.

A recent traveller in the United States gives an account of a matrimonial lottery, which was formed there with beneficial effects. At a wedding in South Carolina, a young lawyer moved "That one man in the company should be selected as president; that this president should be duly sworn to keep entirely secret all the communications that should be forwarded to him in his official department that night; that each unmarried gentleman and lady should write his or her name on a piece of paper, and under it place the name of the person they wished to marry; then hand it to the president, for inspection; and if any gentleman and lady had reciprocally chosen each other, the president was to inform each of the results, and those who had not been reciprocal in their choice, kept entirely secret." After the appointment of the president, communications were accordingly handed up to the chair, & it was found twelve young gentlemen and ladies had made reciprocal choices; and the traveller states that eleven of the twelve matches were solemnized.—Lon. Couv.

[A good but tough story.]
