It must be a wonderful thing to be the first person who has visited one of the lovely, lonely atolls of the Pacific. whose only inhabitants are birds. Fifty years ago this was a more common occurrence than it is now, when the s as are so full of great ships and steamers, as well as smaller craft, that most them had been at some time visited. Professor Dana, who went out on an exploring expedition some time ago, says that "on one atoll, where no natives ever dwelt, the birds were so innocent of fear that we took them from trees as we would fruit, and many a songster lost a tail feather as it sat perched upon a branch apparently unconscious that the world contained an enemy." They had never found out the vow of eternal enmity sworn against the birds by the boys. Poor little heathen birds! How they did need a

You may have neard of the coral insect, and of its wonderful industry in building up great islands in the sea, as if coral was built as honeycomb is. The coral animal is not an insect, nor anything like one, and builds the coral precisely as you build the bones in your body. It is a sort of flower-animal, shaped like an aster or an anemone or a daisy. It has nothing of the flower about it except a resemanimal as an oyster or a fish. The coral polyp has a thick stem crowned by a row of petal-like arms arranged about a center, or sometimes several rows so arranged. The stem is the body, and the upper part of this is a hollow sack—the stomach. The center of the flower is the mouth, and the petals are feeders to catch and draw in the floating food that comes within reach. Some of the seaanemones do not make coral, and others do, but all are constructed on this simple flower plan.

When you eat and digest your food new particles of flesh are formed. These are pushed in between the particles already there, and at the same time old particles which are dead and of no further use are cast off. While you are growing, more new particles are made than old ones are to you cast off. This constant change goes on the bones as well as in the flesh, though more slowly.

Such a change is all the while taking place in the coral polyps. The coral is the skeleton of the polyp. stead of the skeleton being all inside the polyp's body, as yours is in you (except your teeth), or all outside, as it is in the oyster, it is partly in and partly out. In the lower part of the coral animal, below the stomach, is the skeleton; as the polyp grows it keeps adding particles to its skeleton, and as it does not cast off any the skeleton grows too long for the polyp, and left behind as a solid stem, on the tip of which is the flower-like animal.

The polyp, though an animal, is of a | State for thirty-seven years. very low order. It is really only a stomach, a mouth, and feeders.
