My dear Emory:

Your letter received this morning was a great pleasure to me. We are all liable to make mistakes and I like to be told of mine in the way you put it in your letter. You and I have not only a common interest in our business, each trying to make an honest living in the same kind of business, but also have very much the same views and the proper feelings. I rejoice in your success and you are pleased to know that when I do well. It is not so with all who engaged in the same pursuit. We can go in a race with our horses and if you have more speed than I have I can congratulate you and you
