

Cabin passage. I fear their friends here will do but little for them in these "hard times".

I shall endeavor to obtain enough to pay their fare to Baltimore, personally.

If the piano could be disposed of there to a good advantage, it would in my judgment be the best policy; but the daughter would be sorry to part with it, and the thing might be impracticable. The father has suggested its being sold, or exchanged for something more valuable to them. If there were more time, I should wish you to confer with him on the subject. You will find them disposed to listen to suggestions, and to follow good counsel, I trust.
