The Life of The Turkey.

BY MRS. WEBB HILL, KENT COUNTY.

The most difficult part of turkey raising is knowing how to care for them, to know what to do and when to do it. All that one can learn from others or from reading will not be of equal value to one year's actual experience in caring for them. While our present day turkeys are classed as domestic fowls they are rather semi domestic when compared with other poultry for this reason, the treatment given them must differ from that given to hens and chickens. Satisfactory results can never be secured by handling them like cage birds or hot house plants. Avoid overdoing the care and attention.

Treat them like turkeys and use common sense in looking after them. Their native home was in the woods and field, in their present semidomestic condition they need more shelter and care, but they should never be shut in so close as to deprive them of plenty of light, sun, room and air. When quite young the turkeys are apt to receive more attention than they need. Then, as they grow older and the novelty of attending to them wears off, they are too often neglected just at the time when more care should be given to them.

When the turkeys are ready to leave the nest an open coop may be placed over the mother turkey just prior to the hatching of her eggs. She for a week or so should be thoroughly dusted with insect powder. The chief danger from lice and mites attack the turkeys is directly after they are hatched. The best remedy is to deal with the hen before the young are hatched. Examine the young carefully for lice which may be found on the head or under the throat, they may be destroyed by the use of sweet oil rubbing a very small amount on the head and throat. It is very important that only a small amount be used as too much is injurious. While they are young special attention must be given to protection from the direct rays of the sun, at times they will reel under its influence as though suffering from sunstroke, moving about draging one foot after the other while giving feeble peeps that sounds the warning of their approaching end. When under under the influence of both at the same time the chance of survival is small indeed. Before the mother hen is put in the coop it should be fumigated, whitewashed or painted with crude petroleum, but if the latter preparation is used it should be done about a week before the coop is used, as the odor of the preparation has disappeared as it is not beneficial to the young.

Have a dry spot where the young turkeys can run and exercise. This may be provided by spreading a load or two of coarse sand under and around the coop which will furnish a dry foot hold, no matter how damp and wet the grass may be. To keep this in a sanitary condition it could be swept over with a broom, or go over it every morning with a fine tooth garden rake in order that the sun may dry and freshen it. There are many methods of feeding young turkeys while all who succeed seem to adopt nearly the same plan.

There are a few differences worthy of consideration, some feed bread and milk in a saucer as soon as they will eat while others soak bread in milk and squeeze it dry before feeding while others feed absolute grain diet; some feed everything they imagine they will eat. But it should never be forgotten in the wild state their food was bug and worms, seed, etc., which they could find for themselves which was hunted for and scrambled after continually. There was then no over-feeding upon rich unnatural foods that impaired health and produced bowel trouble or other ailments that naturally follow unwholesome food.

If the grower wishes to copy nature as nearly as possible the young turkeys may be given for their first meal very fine cracked wheat and corn. Some of the commercial brands of poultry foods are also very good which should have a little hard boiled eggs mixed with it, should also have some very fine sand mixed with it. As a general rule do not feed them wet feed or slops. Turkeys are seed eating chicks not slop eaters. Light bread soaked in sweet milk press out the milk until very dry is very good for the first day or two, feed this a little at a time every hour or two for two days more. They should be fed very early in the morning and at frequent intervals during the day. Give them all they will eat willingly and no more. They should have fresh water at all times Bowel trouble must be considered as an assured result of improper feeding or from exposure to cold and dampness.

Indigestion is a prime factor in the development of this ailment that kills so many while young. This should be prevented so far as possible by the feeding of finely broken charcoal which is a safeguard against fermentation in the crop or gizzard, thus aiding digestion. The looseness of the bowels should not be mistaken for cholera. It may be relieved by feeding rice that has been boiled almost dry in milk. Many young turkeys are lost when partly grown particularly during wet weather after they have been given libesty to roam at will.

Much loss may be avoided by going after them wherever they may be and feeding them a little once or twice a day. This plan should be followed during continual wet weather. No matter how far advanced they may be a continual wet spell deprives them of a greater part of their food bugs and worms they feed upon. Go after them during such weather and feed them so to prevent the bad results that must follow a scarcity of food at such times. As soon as the weather begins to turn cold and insect food becomes scarce an increase grain diet must be provided for them. A ration of wheat and corn is this best. Do not feed them too much at first but gradually increase the supply until they are having all they will eat.

Black head, while this disease is attributed to microbes it is thought to be very much aggravated or increased through inbreeding, in other words, many attribute the prevalence of what is known as blackhead to the run down vitality of the stock of breeding turkeys making it possible for the germs to grow and gain destructive foothold. Diarrhoea is the most marked and constant symptom and may be expected sooner or later in the course of the disease. It results from inflammation and internal weakness. A peculiar discoloration of the head occurs when the disease is at its height which has led to the popular designation of Blackhead. The disease attacks very young turkeys This affection is more active during mid-summer, and has led to the belief that it is exclusively a summer disease. Some people who have had experience with this ailment in recent years believe that it results largely from inbreeding the infection being transmitted from one flock to another by affected birds or eggs, the remedies applied proving of little benefit. The only alternation is the introduction of new, strong and healthy stock. When the turkeys are suitably housed properly fed and kept free from lice they are quite as easy to grow as young chicks.
