POULTRY NOTES

Written for the KENT NEWS by a Kent County Poultryman.

I mentioned recently the fact of seeing hens closed up in yards on the farm. I cannot see the necessity but if you must do it why not fence in the orchard as a chicken yard. It will answer a double purpose with great advantage. Shade is necessary for poultry; cultivation is necessary for the orchard, and this tends to keep the orchard fresh and so guards against disease in your flock. The poultry are as good as spraying, they eat many of the bugs and insects so destructive to the trees. And poul-droppings are the very best fertilizers.

At this time of year many farmers and others are only just beginning to raise their chicks. Those of us who are after the illusive winter eggs have by this time got out our main broods and are in the midst of our trouble. But of those who are starting some will purchase chicks, some eggs and some possibly 8 weeks old chicks. Some have a decided preference for some particular breed and to others all hens look alike. It is to the latter I would address a few words. Taking things all in all, there is no one best breed of poultry, there are many very excellent breeds and their qualifications are such that you can meet almost any requirement. For the farm there are four breeds that should have precedence for many reasons. What are known as the egg breeds are too small and too flighty tor the farm and what are known as the meat breeds are not good enough layers.

The four breeds refered to are Orpingtons, R. I. Reds, Rocks, and Wyandottes. Aside from the fact that they are the best breeds for the farmers own use there is undoubtedly more money in a general purpose fowl than in one of the so called egg breeds. As I have said before, the leghorn does not show the superiority claimed for it as an egg producer, if we conside the results of the various recent tests, and it is not to be compared with the Orpington and Red as a winter layer. When we consider the total egg production of the various breeds there is not very much to choose for if we take the mean of the Missouri and Philadelphia contests we find the average production to be: Reds 156, Orpingtons 153, Leghorns 150, Wyandottes, 146, Rock 144. This shows a difference of only 12 eggs a year between the various breeds. But now let us look again at the records for the three months of December, January, and February, the months of high priced eggs and the period of big poultry profits, the rate of laying is then:-

Orpington 151, Reds 140, Wyandottes 89, Leghorns 83, Rocks 61. These figures show the Orpington and Reds to be in a class almost by themselves as far as winter eggs are concerned, and the Orpington to be 11 eggs better than the Red and this when every egg counts.

Another thing that requires consideration is the size and the quality of the carcas. The utility breeds should weigh respectively.

	Cock. lbs.	Hen. lbs.	Cock'ls. lbs.	Pul. lbs.
Orpingtons	10	8	8½	7
Rocks	9½	7½	8	6½
Wyandottes	8½	6½	7½	5½
Reds	8½	6½	7½	5

While these weights are a little higher than the general run of farm poultry, th y are not hard to maintain, and the Orpington will often weigh more. And when we consider that the production of meat is fully as profitable as the production of eggs, this question of weight is a large factor. Of the utility breeds the flesh of the R. I. Reds is possibly the least satisfactory. The Rocks have always been esteemed for their flesh and the Wyandottes are nearly if not their equal and with their nicely rounded bodies require no fattening for market. The Orpington is the ideal table fowl and their fine textured, juicy, white meat is equalled by no other fowl and approached only by the Langshan.

A Severe Sickness Leaves The Kidneys Weak

After recovering from a severe spell of sickness some time ago, I was all run down and suffering from poor blood. I would have pains in my back and hips and my kidneys bothered me all the time.
