"THE TOMBOY"

By MINNIE M. TOWNSEND.

(By 1921, by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)
 "Whew, what a hit."
 Across the length of a scrubby field, John Blake, tired school teacher and confirmed bachelor, watched a dirty baseball go swinging on its way, from the home plate of the Serry village grounds, straight out over the field to the main street. No—he held his breath in consternation—straight into the cellar window of the cottage belonging to the town's one constable.
 It wasn't the beauty of a perfect "Babe Ruth" home runner the pretentious smashing of the aforesaid window, that called for the above ejaculation by the usually grouchy teacher, but the fact that the young person at the plate wore a pink skirt and neat middie blouse and had curly dark hair blowing provokingly from under the boy's cap which she wore.
 Under ordinary circumstances John Blake would have called the guilty person to task, as the field was a part of the school property. But this was a different case—a girl and apparently a new comer to the village. He had never seen a girl handle a bat in such a fearless, businesslike way. Wavering as to the proper course for him to pursue, he watched her hurry across the field, to his curiosity and the ire of the constable's wife. She bravely mounted the cottage steps and rang the bell. The lady, who was subject to neuralgia and was having an off day, glared in anger.
 "Humph! My man just fixed that window last week. If you must play ball near folks' houses why can't you go easy. The idea of hittin' clear across that field." The girl on the steps below, smiled wistfully, "I'm sorry, madam; you see it was a home run," and added with a touch of pride, "and these don't happen very often."
 The old lady's eyes flashed.
 "Well, it's nothin' to me, home runs er—er—" She floundered hopelessly until the girl put in softly, "Or two bagger, perhaps."
 The thin lips shut with a snap and then—"It will cost you fifty cents anyway and I ought to charge you more for my man's labor."
 Suddenly a tall figure loomed up in back of the girl and a slim white hand thrust a crisp dollar bill out at the old lady. "Believe me, madam," said the cool voice of John Blake, "that hit was easily worth a dollar."
 A moment later the tomboy and John Blake, who had been eavesdropping for the first time in his life, were walking down the street together.
 "Guess our neuralgia friend doesn't appreciate the intricacies of our national game," he remarked kindly, and was about to make himself more plain when she answered readily, "Oh, but cellar windows do not grow on trees, sir. I thank you for helping me out, and I'll return the money at school, to-morrow."
 The young man had an uncomfortable feeling that the brown eyes under the boyish cap were laughing at him as the girl soberly bade him goodbye, and if there was anything that nettled him it was ridicule. What the joke was he tried hard to fathom. He had merely tried to be kind to a little tomboy in a rather tight financial position. He tried to save over his wounded dignity, but next morning found him grouchier than ever and much disposed to find the girl and give her a belated reprimand. Casually he glanced over the older classes, but there was no sign of the brown-eyed tomboy.
 In his abstraction he almost forgot the new teacher of the fourth grade. After the curtain of greeting, he solemnly laid down the law until the light died out of the young teacher's eyes and she looked scared and a little bewildered.
 After school closed that day, Miss Crane, fourth grade teacher, entered the principal's office and waited humbly until that official finished reading a letter. Then she carefully drew a crisp, new dollar bill from her pocket and held it out.
 "I want to return the money, Mr. Blake, with thanks. I did not realize that playing baseball was such a crime, as I have always played with my brothers, but I'm sorry, especially about the window. Also I think, sir, that I have better my mind, but you run—a final one. My resignation."
 The sedate young principal removed his horn rimmed glasses and scanned the face above him, but there was no trace of mischievousness in the brown eyes, only a dull hurt and the sudden culmination of her first attempt of teaching. He tried to vision the fourth grade room without his particular acquisition and he could not seem to place another teacher there. He shook his head emphatically, "You can't go this way, Miss Crane. Please reconsider."
 She shook her head, "I must, I never could work under such an antagonistic feeling Mr. Blake."
 Next to ridicule, the young man hated to give in to anybody, but finally he got on his feet and grinning in a very boyishly sheepish manner, held out his hand, "If you'll stay, Miss Crane, I'll let you teach me the intricacies of our national game."
 Suffice it to say that the pupils of the fourth grade greeted their already beloved teacher the following morning and about 200 more mornings and then they all acted as escorts to the carriage which conveyed Mr. and Mrs. John Blake to the station, when they left to learn the "intricacies of another game," new to both.
