Rheumatism Now Conquered

BY CHESTERTOWN DOCTOR

ALSO CURES KINDRED COMPLAINTS, LUMBAGO, SCIATICA AND NEURITIS.

Scores of people all over Kent and Queen Anne's, Talbot and Caroline are bringing their troubles to Dr. Dill, the Chiroprator, of Chestertown, and leaving without them.

Mr. Robt. McKenny, of near town, suffered for years with neuritis in his shoulders, arms and lumbago. Mr. McKenny tried most everything without releif. Finally he took special adjustments from Dr. Dill, Chestertown, and is now free of all his pains. Mr. McKenny praises Dr. Dill in highest terms.

Robin Butler, of Worton, almost went crazy with sciatic rheumatism and roaring in the head. His kidneys were also inactive and he felt worn out and tired. After a course of spinal adjustments he was restored to perfect health and lauds Dr. Dill highly.

Mr. S. A. Wallen, of Millington, also suffered with a sluggish liver and lumbago. He says he now feels 20 years younger.

Mr. Willson Bedwell, of Lynch, suffered with neuritis so badly he could not milk his cows. He wants the whole world to know he is better.

Mrs. Kate Collins, of Lynch, also pays a great tribute to Dr. Dill. She is over 50 now, but says she feels like 21.

These are just a few cases picked at random that we know of. There are dozens of others who gladly testify as to what Chiropractic has done for them. Anyone suffering with anything from Headaches to Bunions should consult Dr. Dill at once.

Other testimonials will be published next week.

Lottie and Emlie Usilton, of Greensboro, children now pictures of health, came all the way from Greensboro three times a week to the offices of Dr. Dill to be cured of dreaded asthma. Lottie and Emily are the 5-year-old twins of Mr. and Mrs. Howard Usilton, of Greensboro, Caroline county. Many times during the past two years Mr. and Mrs. Usilton thought there was no hope for them. Eminent specialists of Baltimore and Philadelphia were consulted, but they could do no good. The doctors thought Emlie's trouble might be due to bad tonsils and they wanted to operate, but the parents objected. Mr. Usilton heard of a new doctor in Philadelphia, who worked on the nerves and spine and who had performed wonderful cures in cases of asthma. They consulted him and was referred to Dr. Dill, of Chestertown. The little girls came to town three times a week for treatment and soon the effects of dreaded asthma disappeared. The children are now healthy and happy having had no recurrence of the trouble. They romp and play and help their father out on the farm and often refer to the "good doctor in Chestertown" who cured them of their suffering.

SWOLLEN RIVER

By MAE NORTON MORRIS

(©, 1923, by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)

A BRISK March wind swept down the Concord river, chilled by melting snow and floating ice cakes.

Old Dave rested his withered hands on the railing of the little red iron bridge and gazed into the rushing torrent below.

"Her current's swift," he mumbled; "wide—and powerful—swift."

A boyish gleam lit for a fleeting second his faded eyes. "Pussy willows over yonder on the bank," he whispered; "used to pick 'em there."

"Old Dave's taking it hard," said one of the idlers on the porch of the general store.

"Kinder tough at his age," remarked his companion; "seems like they could have let the old man stay on; it would not be for long."

"Going up to the auction, are you?" asked the first speaker.

"No," replied the other; "my old woman says there ain't nothing there she wants—just old musty trash and what-not. Don't calculate they'll get much for the cottage neither; it needs a lot of fixing. If Jim had lived he'd never seen his father go to no home, but Mark's Marla wears the pants and she wouldn't have the old man around."

"Guess Dave's going back now for another look at the cottage," said the other. "Believe Mark and Marla are going to keep him up there tonight and take him to the home tomorrow."

With faltering steps old Dave went up the little red gravel path to the cottage. He stopped by a small leaf-banked flower bed and, stooping, dug with trembling fingers beneath the rotting leaves and mold. He chuckled softly to himself at what he found; tiger lilies' pale green noses greeted him through the sod.

"I know'd you'd be there," he said, caressingly; "right where Mame planted you, so long past."

Tenderly he covered them again with the brown, wet leaves.

"'Tain't quite safe yet," he said, "but you won't have long to wait—not long."

The auctioneers were already there, and when Dave saw them in the front hall he started guiltily, tottered into the side yard and sat on the old back steps. There he basked in the warm sun and tried to forget.

A big maltese cat brushed against his legs. Old Dave smoothed her sleek back with an unsteady hand.

"Wonder what they'll do with you, kitty?" he whispered; "poor kitty."

Tears blinded him—he cried like a little child, mumbling between his broken sobs, "Poor kitty, poor old cat!"

"We'll fool 'em," he said to the cat, with a grim smile; "you and me will fool 'em." And, taking the cat in his arms, he made his way slowly back to the little red iron bridge over the rushing river.

"The current's swift," he said, as he stroked her head, "but you ain't afraid, be you kitty? Jim'll be there on the other side waiting—our Jim that loves us—our Jim!"

Old Dave was smiling now.

"Remember the day he said 'good-by,' looking so smart in his khaki suit? How long ago is it? Seems a long time."

A robin in the bushes on the bank of the river called lustily to its mate. Dave shook his head. "Kinder hard, with spring coming, but we're going to Jim and the rest over there—and—the river—see how the river rushes and hurries—"

A big hand rested in his shoulder, and a strong voice cried: "Dad! Dad! Don't you know me?"

"Jim!" he breathed, without surprise. "My Jim! I knowed you'd be here." Then confusion seized him. "Did I do it?" he asked in a frightened whisper. "I was afraid, for the current was wide and swift, but I know'd you'd be here."

"There, dad," said the man, soothingly, as he pulled the old man by the coat-sleeve; "come home and we'll talk things over."

"Home?" Dave echoed; "where, Jim? Mark's selling the old home today—that's why I did it—that's why I came to the river."

"What!" gasped the son, as he realized the truth. "It might have happened in another second, and he thinks we are both on the other side even now.

"Dad, look at me! I'm alive and I've come home to you. There isn't going to be any auction. You and I are going home to the cottage to live. I've seen Mark and I'm paying off the mortgage tomorrow. Don't you understand, dad?"

Old Dave rubbed his eyes with the back of his trembling hand.

"If it's true, Jim," he said, in scarce a whisper, "where've you been so long?"

"Put on the 'missing' list, that's all, and tied up in a hospital. Shell shock, and this"—he showed an empty sleeve. "But it doesn't matter now, dad. I'm home to stay."

Back up the red gravel path, arm in arm, they went, smilingly content; and the big maltest cat brushed past them to the steps ahead, paused there and arched her back in welcome.

Clearly Not That.

Two farmers were walking along a street when they came across a mail box.

"Bill, what's this?" said Jake.

"It looks like a Salvation Army box to me," said Bill.

"It can't be that," said Jake. "It says, 'No collection on Sundays.'"
