TELEPHONES A LARGE FACTOR AT CONVENTION

More telephone and telegraphic equipment than has ever before been put in any one building in New York for temporary use was installed in Madison Square Garden for the Democratic National Convention. Over 1,000,000 feet of telephone wire was added to the normal telephone facilities, a special system being provided to serve almost 600 telephone lines of various classifications. The Bell System Public Address apparatus was also established in the Garden.

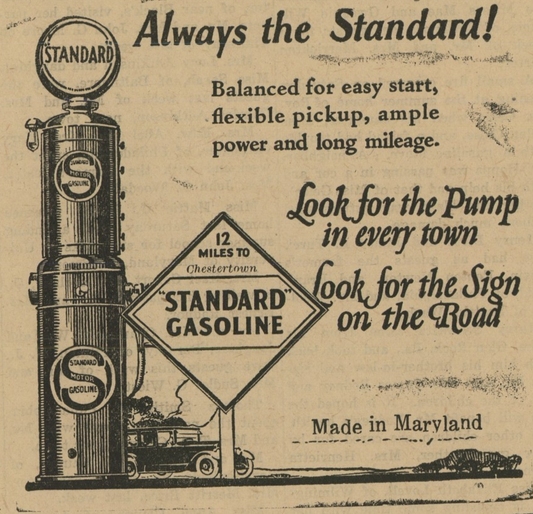

Two instruments on the desk of the Chairman of the Convention enabled him to communicate at once with strategic points in the Garden. To maintain these added telephone facilities, which included eleven switchboard positions, ninety-two telephone booths and seventy-one coin box telephones, a special force of operators and telephone men was required.

Many local radio fans had an opportunity of hearing the convention proceedings broadcasted by the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Company's station W C A P.

JUDD'S STORY

By MARGARET A. SWEENEY

(©, 1923, by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)

THE two men, lounging in wing chairs upon the veranda of the Red Clover club, talked in undertones. All through the long June afternoon they had, intermittently, talked of Hartly—Barlow Hartly, and his strange passing. Yesterday he had played golf with them; today—there was no today for Barlow Hartly.

"There is, no doubt, a woman mixed up in it," Jackson, the younger of the two, reiterated.

The other man, Judd, did not answer. He contemplated the strip of olive green awning that almost touched the top of the bayberry hedge bordering the veranda.

Beyond the bayberry hedge lay a road, black and shining, and over it swept a stream of motorcars. Now and then a girl's laugh or a snatch of song, mingling with the plaintive call of a lone robin, came to the two men upon the veranda.

After a long silence, Jackson spoke again: "Hartly had wealth and health and—and position. Only a woman could—"

"Hartly was not mixed up in any affair of that kind—I knew Hartly!" Judd tartly asserted.

"I don't know"—there was a challenge in his gray eyes as he turned again to Jackson. "I don't know just how, why or when Hartly got his ideas of living and dying mixed up, but I do know this: The thing that happened happened because Hartly did not have a friend—a real friend.

"No friend?" Jackson questioned. "He had more friends than—"

"Yes." Judd broke in, "I know the kind of friends he had—the kind that you and I have. Good fellows, no doubt, but—"

"But?" Jackson insisted.

"Well, I—I can't seem to find the word for which my mind is—is groping—pehaps I can make myself understood by—by telling you my own story:

"About ten years ago I had, I assured myself, reached the end of my rope. I was thirty then—disappointed, discouraged, disillusioned. Life stretched out before me like a long gray corridor—a one-way passage.

"I had in some way, without knowing it, put a very high value on cheap things, and because these cheap things had slipped through my fingers I could see nothing before me but that long, gray corridor and the mysterious door waiting to close behind me.

"It was an evening like this—a June evening—when I decided to pass the portals of that mysterious door. I was alone among strangers. No one, I told myself, would greatly mind my going. But something, perhaps just the instinct of a wounded animal, urged me to go away from the hotel where I was staying—away from human habitation.

"Toward midnight I found myself tolling up a hill a few miles outside the city. Upon reaching the summit I sat down, and before me, as before the eyes of a drowning man, there swept a picture of the past—mother and home and childhood friends; college, young manhood, a business venture, failure—and then this—this blighting thing that had made my life a burden.

"Alone, under the stars, before the mysterious door through which I was about to enter, I paused to pray. I was not a praying man, but it seemed only decent to ask His pardon for presuming to enter that door unbidden. In the silence I knelt, but my lips were dumb—I had forgotten how to pray—how to talk to God.

"With head bowed I knelt there, striving to find words for a riotous stream of thought that surged and tumbled through my mind. Then—then, out of the silence, out of the night, came the old, old command: 'Be still and know that I am God—the spirit of Truth within thee.'

"Like oil upon troubled water it calmed the turbulent stream of thought. In some mysterious way the spirit of Truth had indeed touched me. I had become vividly conscious of a Presence—a new courage thrilled me. A Friend had come into my life, and I looked out upon a new vista. I saw that the things for which I had struggled were cheap things—cheap, perishable things, upon which I had put a ridiculously high value. Then, in some way, out of turmoil and fret of soul I had found peace.

"After a while the dawn of another day began to break, and soon the skyline was drawn with a pencil that left a golden line.

"Before me still stretched the one-way passage with its mysterious door, but the passage now was dappled with sunshine, and there were pleasant little alcoves extending from it—little restful Clover clubs, where one might tarry along the way. The mysterious door had lost its terror, for I no longer walked alone, and the door, I felt assured, was just the opening that led into another room.

"And so, I say, the thing that happened to Hartly happened because—well, because he—he was alone and he saw only the gray corridor and the mysterious door."

Judd had finished. In the dusk of the veranda Jackson's cigar glowed, and only the plaintive call of a lone robin broke the silence.

Spoiled It.

"You used to say you thought heaven sent me to you," said the young wife tearfully during their first spat.

"And I say so still—"

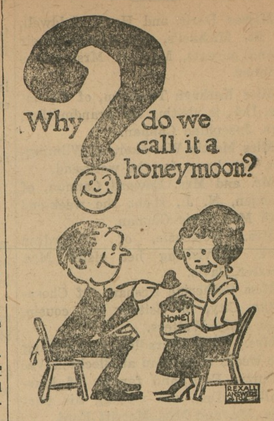

"Really?" she exclaimed, delighted.

"Yes," he added coldly, "as a punishment."—Boston Transcript.

While the public is reading about the Democratic nominee for President, John W. Davis calmly goes on with his work at the Kearny Works of the Western Electric Company.

Davis is an instructor in the inspection section of the Waverly Shops and the work done by him and his fellow workmen in the factory cabling department is an important factor in the manufacture of telephone switchboards.

In the general service department of the Kearny Works there is another J. W. Davis and he too is employed in the manufacture of telephone communication equipment.
