

A Perfect Day

No form of out-door sport affords greater exhilaration than a tramp through the fields at this season—in the brisk, frosty morning air.

The startled rabbitt, which scampers away from your feet, the whirr of the quail or pheasant, the occasional shot at migrating ducks, offer a range of shooting unequaled at any other season.

The Perfect Gun

Then if you're carrying a Lefever Shotgun and using Peters' Shells you can truly come home at night and say, "Twas a perfect day".

Quick action and perfect balance are the prime requirements in a gun. And you want a shell which will deliver a hard hitting, evenly distributed shot pattern.

Lefever Guns and Peters' Shells fill these requirements exactly.

Fresh Shells

Proper Loads for all sizes of game—Smokeless, Black Powder. Double Barroll Shotguns, Repeaters, Automatics.

EASTON HOSPITAL REPORT

Emergency Hospital has just finished its fiscal year, and at the meeting of members last week the report of the Superintendent was presented.

Miss Butler was able to show that 1100 patients had been admitted and treated in twelve months, which was 79 more than for the year previous.

There were 75 births and 76 deaths, 24 of which died within 48 hours, these being patients that were too far affected before they were finally brought to the institution. There were 14 typhoid patients.

Of the 1100 patients admitted, 925 of them were white, 185 colored; 177 of the total were medical patients and 688 were surgical. There were 534 patients from Talbot county, 189 from Queen Anne's, 210 from Caroline, 109 from Kent, 8 from Dorchester, 4 from Worcester, 20 from Baltimore, 11 from Delaware, 8 from Pennsylvania, and 1 to 6 from scattered localities.

TELEPHONE PLAYED IMPORTANT PART IN WORLD'S SERIES

Chesapeake & Potomac Officials Forced To Anticipate Championship By Many Months.

Along about last June, when the Capital City's Senators were in first place, only a few optimistic fans were predicting with any assurance that the fighting Nats would win the American league championship. Long years of last division finishes had put a damper on the confidence of even the most faithful Washington fans.

But Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Company officials were taking no chances; they realized that if by any chance the World's Series did come to Washington, it would mean unusual conditions and a rapid jump in telephone traffic. Washington had always been a great "baseball town," and it was argued that if the Nats did come out on top the attraction of seeing the underdog fight his way up would draw many thousands to the city from all parts of the surrounding country.

So, even during the days of Washington's slump when it was extremely doubtful whether or not the Nats would finish in first place, the telephone men were doggedly busy with pen and paper. The problem was somewhat of a difficult one, inasmuch as there was no certainty whether four games or seven were to be played, and especially because most of the traffic would be crowded to within a few hours each day.

The regular operating force was, of course, not adequate to take care of the emergency. The Telephone Company decided that, under the circumstances, it would not pay them to train the additional operators needed for the Series and then release them; so they undertook to locate the girls who had formerly been with the Company and were now occupied in the business of keeping house for "hubby" or working along some similarly strenuous line of endeavor. It was, perhaps, an extraordinary tribute to the spirit the Telephone Company develops in its employees that 165 of them expressed themselves as ready and willing to help out, even though many of them were in no need of the extra money. Vacations of many of the regular operators were then arranged so that they would come after the close of the baseball season, and all preparations were made to take care of the increased business.

All this was of course done on the chance that the Nats would come through with a victory, and at this time that "if" was a mighty big one. As the race drew to a close and the Senators again regained the lead and hung on from day to day by the skin of their teeth, interest in baseball in the Capital City grew more and more intense. Thousands of fans began calling the newspaper offices during the times the games were in progress and even after the games were over the ardent rooters were eagerly clamoring for details of the doings of the home team's closest competitors. Each afternoon it was necessary to add to the regular operating force in order that the calls to the newspaper offices could be handled with the usual speed, and at the same time seeing that the service in general did not suffer from the increased volume of traffic.

When at last the long-awaited series did open in Washington, thanks to their foresight and ingenuity, the Telephone Company was equipped to promptly handle all calls. Even though many were watching the game, or posted near scoreboards and radio sets, thousands of calls poured in all afternoon; even when the Nationals were playing in New York the traffic load did not perceptibly lessen. At the seventh game, the deciding one of the series, interest was at fever heat. Calls for the day arose from the normal of 402,000 to a peak of nearly 500,000, but of these few were kept waiting more than an instant. Toll traffic, too, increased considerably, and after the game a few hundred fans presumably used Long Distance to tell their friends in other places the good news.

The Telephone Company, in addition to keeping up the service in Washington, enabled thousands of fans in other cities to hear the returns via radio through their powerful station WCAP, located at their headquarters in Washington.

Rhode Islanders Get 100,000th Telephone

The New England Telephone and Telegraph Company recently installed its 100,000th telephone in Rhode Island. The instrument was placed in the home of Nathan D. Zuill, of Pawtucket. Rhode Island, although the smallest State in the Union in area, now has as many telephones as the States of Alabama or Louisiana and exceeds 14 other States in the number of instruments.

The case of Sheriff William Goodman vs. Richard Haggerty, of Kennedyville removed from the Kent to the Queen Anne's county court which was to have been tried in Centreville last week was postponed until January. This is a suit for $10,000 damages brought by Sheriff Goodman against Mr. Haggerty for alleged injuries received by the sheriff's son in an automobile accident last fall on Washington avenue, when, in attempting to cross the street the boy was knocked down by Mr. Haggerty's car driven by himself, the boy receiving a broken leg.

HIT BY A FLYING PEBBLE

Mrs. Barnhart, of Millington, came to Chestertown Friday evening to do some shopping. In passing from the American Stores to the Voshell House Corner she was struck in the forehead by what seemed to be a shot. She was accompanied to J. E. Newton's shop and Dr. H. P. Copeland summoned. The latter at once had her removed to his office on the Square and dressed the wound. Had the wound been a half-inch lower it would have pierced Mrs. Barnhart's eye and probably resulted fatally. She was later able to be taken to her home in Millington, and we since learn is recovering rapidly. Upon further investigation we learn that a large truck was passing and backfired and the explosion from the backfire blew a pebble from the street, striking Mrs. Barnhart in the forehead, inflicting a deep gash.

COL. WOODCOCK'S SPEECH

Of the many distinguished men who have addressed the Easton Rotary Club, none have made quite so profound impression as did Col. A. W. Woodcock United States District Attorney, of Baltimore, when on Wednesday evening he made an eloquent plea for the better observance and enforcement of the law: He said in part:

"It is a noteworthy fact that the matter of enforcing the criminal law has recently become a topic of nationwide discussion. In the past it was generally assumed that the criminal law was enforced despite the fact that crimes continued.

"The first code of laws which influenced English people was the ten commandments received by Moses. This code has had the sanction of religion, and with the possible exception of the first, second, and last, each has been for centuries a part of our statute law. Not one of these commands, I believe, has ever been completely enforced in the sense that violations of it have ceased. And yet one would hardly say that the eighth commandment, for instance, that is, the modern law of larceny and fraud, is not now being enforced. Of course, automobiles are stolen, banks robbed, widows deprived of their savings by sellers of worthless securities, with a fair degree of regularity. So when we say that a given law is enforced, we mean not that violations have ceased, but that, when complaint is made and the evidence is available and the courts functioning properly, the violator is punished. His punishment is supposed, in various theories, to reform him and to deter others from committing similar offense. But violations have not ceased as a result. Their number may have been decreased. Almost any one would say, however, that the larceny and fraud laws are enforced.

"As to the National Prohibition Law, however, the cry is very general not only that it isn't enforced, but that it can't be enforced. Many persons who did not approve that particular law, so stated immediately after it was passed, and have continued in a similar strain ever since. And yet it is true that, when complaint is made and the evidence available, that the courts do function and the violators of this law are punished. Offenses continue to be committed just as trusted employes sometimes steal, bandits rob, and confidence men defraud. If there is a difference in the enforcement of the two kinds of laws, it must be one of degree. If you measure the difference in enforcement by the number of violations that continue, then we must conclude that the larcency laws are better enforced. But if one recalls that the human race has had perhaps five thousand years to decide to obey the eighth commandment, the advantage is probably with the eighteenth amendment.

"The figures that are available would indicate a substantial improvement in the material welfare of the people of Maryland under the Volstead Law. The yearly rate of increase of savings bank deposits is much greater and the same is true of the time deposits. There has been an enormous increase also in real estate and personal property values. I do not mean to say these figures are conclusive, but considering the post-war deflation and the fact that we have lost much of our foreign market, these are very significant.

"One thing is certain. Prohibition in Maryland is entitled to a fair trial and the facts entitled to a fair investigation. Both are easily possible without any more legislation. As to the first, if the Governor would order the police of Baltimore City to enforce the State law against selling liquor without a license for a year, I would say that a moderately fair trial has been made.

"We ought to obey the law as it is. We ought to be willing to subordinate any personal inclinations for the general good. We ought to found our discussions of the wisdom of a law upon unbiased inquiry for truth. What is needed is more reverence for law because it is the law, more obedience to it, more inquiry for truth, less vilification and argument by clever innuendo."

CAUTION

All persons are warned against trespassing or trapping with dog, gun or otherwise upon the lands of the undersigned on Worton Manor farm as the law will certainly be enforced.
