STEAM TRAINS SOON TO BE ABANDONED?

That the Peninsula Railroad Company is now planning the electrification of lines extending from Townsend through Massey to Centreville and Chestertown, with the view of reducing expenses thousands of dollars, annually, by the elimination of steam passenger trains, and the curtailment of crews, is an unconfirmed report that has been circulated in railroad circles for some weeks.

The report, which was current more than a year ago, was given fresh impetus by the starting of an electric train over the lines of the Pennsylvania from Harrington to Rehoboth Beach. The report states that officials are looking forward, eventually, to electrification of all branch roads where steam trains are proving unprofitable. These two outstanding economies, it is said, will be effected:

Elimination of steam passenger trains and the substitution of electric engines which can be operated at considerably reduced cost.

Curtailment of train crews to the extent that it has been found possible in other sections where equipment similar to the proposed type has been placed in service.

According to the rumors no material change in the present freight service is contemplated. The plan, it is said, is simply a move to check the growing overhead, which has been particularly marked in recent years with a general reduction in rail traffic following the more general use of automobile lines and the operation of cars owned by individuals.
