Five Dollar Gold Pieces at 12 Cents Each

A very wise man stood on London Bridge and tried to sell guineas at six pence.

He didn't get ONE customer.

The proposition was out of the ordinary, and, coming from a stranger, nobody was willing to risk even 12 cents on the genuineness of the coin.

But if he agreed to remain in the custody of a policeman until the piece was tested, the first passer-by would have bought his goods.

His guarantee didn't count — because he couldn't guarantee his OWN reliability.

———x———

You don't trust folks you don't know—no matter how alluring their propositions.

Bitterly bought experience teaches that those who promise the most, deliver the least.

Exageration and phrase—extravagance are the hall-marks of fraud.
Responsibility counts its words—it must pay so heavily for them.

———x———

Folks aren't accustomed to five-dollar gold-pieces for silver six pences—the six pence isn't worth that much.

There's always something wrong with the goods when the price is suspiciously low.

Faith does not follow until credulity leads the way.

Confidence demands evidence.

Governments can borrow at three per cent.

They represent stability and permanence.

This store has the most customers, not because it had made the greatest effort to attract patronage—but to HOLD it.

It deals in certainties.

You know where to find your money when you don't find satisfaction.

You've traded here without a risk for fifty years. We have lived up to every pledge on every sale.

Our warranty is as sound as legal tender.

———x———

We never offer "guineas for six pence." We neither make nor meet prices below the value line.

We sell many sorts of merchandise which must give service over a long period of time—goods which call for the investment of considerable sums. Time alone can tell their merit.

We bring the world's advance creations to this community—we inaugurate new modes and introduce exclusive ideas, for which reasonable prices must be charged.

But whether we offer a pair of gloves, a suit of clothes, a pair of hoes or a necktie, you may rest assured that it will serve its mission to the last penny and the last day.

We deal in hundreds of commodities, but our principal stock in trade is RELIABILITY.

We sell CONFIDENCE.
