The DAIRY

CLEAN MILK IS NOT DIFFICULT PROBLEM

Contrary to a somewhat common belief, it does not require expensive equipment, high-priced cows, or much extra work to produce clean milk.

With a healthy herd, kept in a clean stable and yard which can be kept clean easily, and with careful attention being given to details a milk can be produced, according to the Wisconsin College of Agriculture, which is both highly nutritious and wholesome.

Since the reputation of many a farm and factory is based on the purity of its products, it is quite important that all of the aids to clean milk production be known. The first consideration, the experts point out, is that of a clean herd. Good milk cannot be produced from diseased cows. A clean stable also aids immensely in the production of clean milk.

Good ventilation is also an important factor. It is quite important that animals secure plenty of pure fresh air since tuberculosis spreads faster and gains an easier foothold where fresh air is not provided in abundance. A dry barnyard and the removal of the manure some distance from the barn will aid greatly in reducing the number of flies which, in the summer, annoy the cows and the milkers.

The value of pure water, abundant sunlight, and careful feeding cannot be overemphasized. The matters of clean milking and clean utensils are intimately associated, for great numbers of bacteria may be introduced into milk from the bodies of the cows and from unsterilized utensils. Quick cooling of milk to lower temperatures prevents bacterial growth and aids in the production of better milk which will keep longer and make finer dairy products.

After the milk has been produced under conditions which are as near ideal as possible, it is important that it be delivered promptly to careful customers. Milk should be kept in cold water until it is loaded onto the wagon to go to the station or receiving plant.

Clean milk means fewer complaints, a better class of patrons, and a steady market for the product.

Bull Most Important Single Animal in Herd

The bull is the most important single factor in the breeding efficiency of the herd, says the New York State College of Agriculture. The bull is often the means of spreading infections in the herd, and should be watched more carefully than any other one member of it.

The college enumerates several points to be remembered on buying or caring for the herd sire. "A bull should always be purchased from a herd as free from breeding troubles as possible. A bull may be backed by wonderful breeding and at the same time be worthless as a breeder. It is advisable to have a newly purchased sire examined by a veterinarian before putting him into service.

"The bull must not be too fat, but he must be kept in good flesh, and one way to do this is to give him plenty of regular exercise. A tread-power or treadmill will help keep him in good trim.

"Do not turn the bull out with the herd, as this makes it impossible to keep an accurate check on him. It is vital to have an accurate record of his services, and to follow through on the results of each one. There is generally something wrong with a bull which is classed as not a sure breeder. A bull of this type may breed some of the cows successfully, but as a general rule he is a menace to the herd.

"The bull should at least have as good care and feeding as the cows of the herd."

Choice Pure-Bred Bull Will Improve Dairy Herd

It is usually the man who cannot afford the luxury of a scrub bull that owns one. Scrub bulls are costing dairymen millions of dollars each year. Only the very rich farmer can afford to own scrub dairy cattle, for he who uses a scrub or even a good grade bull will lose money. In other words, the dairy cow gets her ability to make milk and profits from the inheritance passed on to her from her ancestors.

Since it is most profitable for farmers who are selling cream to a creamery to have their cows freshen in the fall, now is the time to select a bull which will improve his daughters in production over their mothers. A well-selected pure-bred bull from tested ancestry will improve any grade or scrub herd. The well-bred herd bull represents at least 50 per cent of the inheritance of the calf crop. If the herd bull is a scrub, he represents 100 per cent, for all his calves will be scrubs.

Pumpkin Seeds for Cows

Pumpkin seeds are full of nitrogenous material and are a good feed. In some of the foreign countries pumpkin seeds are dried, ground and used for feed. The seeds should not be used in large amounts as they are apt to cause digestive disturbances, but in moderate amounts they are very nutritious. Those having a supply of pumpkins on hand need have no hesitancy about feeding them to cows. They will not cause the cows to go dry.

He Was Due for Promotion

By RHODA MOORE

(Copyright.)

IT WAS exactly 9:30 o'clock, on the morning of June 10, that Lois Huntley came to the staggering conclusion that Allen didn't love her.

She knew it was June 10, for it was her birthday. She was positive it was 9:30 o'clock, for she had glanced at the clock on the desk as she had answered the phone. She was convinced that Allen no longer loved her when he phoned that he would not be home for dinner that night.

No, Allen had never abused her. In all their three years together he had never been really angry. But on this lovely June morning little things from out the past aligned themselves to taunt and jeer her.

There was the Saturday afternoon when Allen had gone to ride in the country with Frank Milton, though she and Allen had had other plans.

There was the matter of the player-piano. Lois had begged Allen to buy one on the installment plan.

That night he had taken her out in the suburbs and shown her the house of her dreams.

"Some day," Allen had said, "we will own a home like that."

For several months now, Allen had been working overtime. Sometimes he didn't get home until ten o'clock.

Now, on top of it all—this! Her birthday, and Allen had forgotten! He didn't love her. This was the end of that perfect union she had visioned on her wedding day! How many times she had heard other young wives air their troubles, and she had vowed, "Allen and I won't be like that when we marry."

Of course, just now the "other man" should enter to offer to take her away from all her misery, but this is precisely what did not happen.

Furiously Lois tore into her morning work and soon had her tiny flat spick and span. She was in a restless, reckless, vengeful mood. What right had Allen to neglect her so?

Her eye fell on her rouge box. Allen detested the stuff. She had discarded it long since, for his sake, but now she seized it eagerly. She also applied powder and lipstick. She viewed the finished job with delight, and then with an added thrill as she thought how angry Allen would be. Slipping into her most daring gown, she stooped and rolled her stockings below the knees. Horrors! What would Allen say?

With a last desperate, wicked impulse she placed one of Allen's cigarettes between her lips, applied a match, and lay back luxuriously in the most approved vamp manner. Suddenly she sat up, throat and lungs smarting and tears pouring from her eyes.

Anyhow, she felt better. Now for a "movie."

From the picture show she hurried to a restaurant, determined not to go home until Allen should return and have time to miss her.

The waiter recognized her and conducted her to a secluded table where she had often sat with Allen in the days when he had still loved her. How nice it would be, she thought, if she only had someone to talk to now. What harm could there be? Allen no longer cared!

Suddenly a voice from the other side of the booth broke in on her thoughts. They were talking about some young man due for promotion. She wasn't particularly interested. The only way Allen could manage a raise was by robbing her of his company at night.

Then, all at once, she was listening intently.

"Of course it isn't certain that Huntly will be chosen for the vacancy, though, by Jove, he deserves it. He isn't afraid of work, and he knows more about the business than any of the rest of us fellows.

"Allen doesn't think they will elect him, but he says that if they do the credit will belong to his wife. She has gone without things she prized to keep him from running into debt. She has understood perfectly the necessity of his leaving her so much at night. Most women would have made a fuss. And she isn't the kind to imagine herself abused if he forgets to kiss her good-by in the morning. She realizes that a busy man, striving for a goal, can't think of everything, and she sends him off with a smile which helps him start the day right. From all Allen has told me of his wife I figure she deserves all the love he certainly holds for her alone."

"Yes," answered his companion "and she sure is a good looker. No paint and powder for her. She doesn't need it and is sensible enough to know it. Some dresser, too—the modest kind; but she always looks like a queen. I hope Allen wins."

Some time later, when silence had persisted for many minutes on the other side of the booth, a little figure stole quietly away and hurried home.

When Allen came home that night a starry-eyed, shining-faced, carefully dressed woman met him as he bounced into the room.

"I have your birthday gift, dear," he cried excitedly. "My promotion, with all it can bring to you. Our little home can now be ours."

With arms around his neck and lips close to his Lois answered:

"I have my promotion, too, dear, to the glorious position of an 'understanding wife.'"

Allen was puzzled by her words, but perfectly satisfied at what he saw deep down in her shining eyes.
