Forty thousand blossoming Mannnig, Bartlett and Keiffer pear trees is attracting many visitors to the Harris farm, sloping down to the upper waters of the Chesapeake Bay near Kent county's bayside resort. Several years ago Mrs. Harris began cultivating her orchard under instruction from University of Maryland experts. Since then, it is said, the trees have increased 500 per cent in productivity. Recently Dr. E. C. Auchter, chief horticulturist of the university, inspected the mammoth orchard and pronounced it in first-class condition. Meanwhile Mrs. Harris has experimented in grafting one variety to weed out non-bearing wood. This attempt will be watched with interest by orchardists along the Eastern Shore.

BASE BALL NOTES

Washington College and University of Maryland will play base ball here this afternoon. It should be an interesting game.

Washington College's base ball team stacked up against two good teams this week and were defeated by Georgetown and Quantico Marines.

The Washington College nine last Saturday handed their ancient rivals, Mt. St. Mary's a 9 to 2 defeat.

Jack Carroll in addition to pitching one of the best games of his college career hit what was probably the longest fly ever poled out on the local field. The ball hit the fence in dead center fielded on the first bounce and would have bounded over had it hit on the turf instead of the soft cinders on the track.

Mandrel proved his case Saturday when his three hits at opportune times were big factors in Washington's success.

BYRD'S FLIGHT OVER POLE

Commander Richard Evelyn Byrd's airplane dash over the North Pole is the second journed by an American to the Top of the World. America's claim to the North Pole is, therefore, in the language of a New York Times correspondnet who accompanied the Byrd expedition to King's Bay, "cinched."

In making his fiight Commander Byrd accomplished what Peary required nearly a year to accomplish. His route was in a beeline almost due north from Kings Bay, a distance of 750 miles; while Peary's route to the Pole and back was an East and West line from Etah, Peary used dog sleds; Byrd used the latest type flying machine, equipped with the latest inventions in compasses and other devices used in air navigation.

The value of such a flight can hardly be measured so soon after its accomplishment. Above all, Byrd has proved, in the face of dissenting opinions of such men as Amundsen and MacMillan, that a flight over the Pole and back in one day is possible; and unquestionably he has paved the way for flights i nthe future which will be as common as the airplane journey's across the American continent are today.

John W. Rolph, son of Charles W. Rolph and wife, of Chestertown, and Miss Julia Angle, of Philadelphia, were quietly married at the M. P. parsonage, Chestertown, Friday at noon. They will tour to Buffalo where they will reside. Mr. Rolph being engaged in business there.

Bishop Cook of Delaware Makes Plain Statements

"We have reason to pray in the words of the litany, 'In all times of prosperity, Good Lord, deliver us," said Bishop Philip Cook, of the Protestant Episcopal Diocese of Delaware, in discussing present-day conditions in his annual address at the 140th annual diocesan convention in All Saints' Church, Rehoboth, Tuesday afternoon.

"If the United States can meet this situation and save its soul amid the temptations which arise from its wealth," asserted the Bishop, it will do more than Israel, or Homer or Spain were able to do in their days of extreme wealth.

Bishop Cook was not at a loss for words in decrying present day conditions in the United States since it has become the wealthiest nation of the world. The Bishop referred to "the lavishness of expenditures such as has seldom been equalled on such a magnificient scale." He scored dress fashions, literature, stage plays and exhibits of life today as "daring."

"That we should be possessors of such wealth and sharers in the income it produces was bound to effect the life o fthe nation profoundly and influence every condition of the social organization," said Bishop Cook. "Where the individual has such freedom of action as in this country it is inevitable that those who have not will take the fashion of their life from those who have. That spirit has entered into our habits. It explains, in very large measure, the crimes and penalties we see around us and those things which furnish the press with their daily news.

"The widespread banditry and bold robberies are traceable to the determination of lawless men to have by violence what other men have gained by the profits of industry and financial manipulation.

"The efforts to enforce prohibition meet open defiance not only on the part of those who want drink but in the action of men who are playing for immense profits which attach to this nefarious and dangerous business. Our weakness and our sin of today are those one might expect to find in a people part of whom have vast wealth—while most of the others desire and seek wealth as the highest aim of life.

"Simplicity of life almost disappears to be replace by wordliness in its most debasing forms. Luxuries become necessities. The home life disappear in the call to many kinds of amusement each one of which offers its one patricular type of thrill. We live on thrills and crimes are not the only things which are daring.

"The dress fashions are daring.

"Literature is daring in its realism. The stage is daring in its defiance of decency. Habits of life are daring in their disregard of the conventions and moral standards.

"This is the situation which America and Christianity in America must face, and every other question is of secondary importance."
