MINE RESCUE WORK

The telephone plays an important part in mine rescue work. Robert M. Lambie, Chief of the West Virginia Department of Mines, pays high tribute to men who installed and maintained telephones at Eccles' mine disaster recently.

"The Department of Mines is greatly indebted to the Chesapeake and Potomac Telephone Company for the cooperation and highly efficient service at Eccles, as well as Benwood, Barrackville and Farmington mine disasters," says Mr. Lambie. "Only those who know the horror and danger of work connected with explosions and mine fires can appreciate what such service means."

"The explosion at the Eccles mine had greatly damaged the shaft and destroyed all telephones and signal service underground. Eddie Stromp, Beckley manager of the telephone company, and linemen from that office arrived on the ground with a load of telephones and equipment soon after the explosion occurred, and immediately started the installation of telephones at all points necessary for emergency and relief service."

A telephone was installed on the cage and four of the rescue party, including Chief Lambie, started down the shaft.

"Telephone service played a very important part in the rescue of the ten men who had baracaded themselves a mile-and-a-half back in the mine. When we found a board marked 'Come to the third right entry (Signed) T. Davis, a telephone message was sent to the surface that there was a possibility of men being alive and asking for a doctor and an additional supply of blankets, hot coffee and restoratives. The men when rescued, appeared to have come from a mausoleum. The news of their being alive was telephoned from the mine to the surface. No one, except those who had urgent and important business had any desire to be out on a night such as that. There was a high wind blowing, and one of the most severe storms experienced in years was raging, yet the telephone men were on the job as soon as it was humanly possible for them to get there with the necessary supplies and equipmen to help in rescue work."

"FATHER" GRAHAM

Forty-seven years' service, with only two days lost time, is the enviable record of Frank A. Graham of the Chesapeake and Potomac Telephone Company, Baltimore.

"Father" Graham, as he is affectionately known by the officials and employees of the company, has been associated with the telephone organization longer than any other member of the organization now on active duty. His record is considered nothing short of phenomenal, both in the telephone industry and elsewhere. In spite of his long period of active service, Mr. Graham is young, both in appearance and in enthusiasm.

Entering the service of the telephone company in Baltimore, August 7, 1879, as a messenger boy in the first central office, established there, Mr. Graham has served in a number of capacities. His first duty consisted in delivering messages received over the telephone. In those days the telephone was not as universally used as it is today. Few business firms and still fewer residents enjoyed the privilege of telephone service. Consequently, messengers were employed by the company to deliver the messages received at the central office. After working as a messenger boy for several months, he became successively night operator, night chief operator, lineman, installer, installation foreman, and engineer's assistant.

During the Baltimore fire of 1904, he was one of those who did valiant work in helping to restore telephone service.

Mr. Graham has always displayed laudable resourcefulness and care in the accomplishment of the tasks assigned him, with the result that he has acquired a reputation for dependability and accuracy. During his almost half century of service, he has never had an accident. He attributes this unusual record of no sickness and no accidents to his temperate habits and even pace of living.

Mr. Graham, in recognition of his long service in telephone work, has been awarded a diamond service emblem. His one ambition is the completion of 50 years of continual service; something that few people try for, much less attain.
