COMMUNICATION ACHIEVEMENTS MARK PROGRESS OF COUNTRY DURING 1927

Transatlantic Telephone Service; Television; Opening Of The Third Transcontinental Line; And Extension Of Long Distance Service To Mexico And Saskatchewan Among Notable Events

A review of last year's telephone progress shows conclusively that there was no diminution in the development of the systems in the United States. According to telephone officials there are now about 18,500,000 telephones in this country, a net gain of more than 750,000 during the past year. The wire plant of the telephone companies, now estimated to be about 63,000,000 miles, was increased by about 5,000,000 miles during 1927.

Constantly people are finding new uses for telephone service and at the close of 1927 there was a daily average of over 72,500,000 conversations made in the United States. This means an average of 205.8 conversations for each man, woman and child in this country.

The advancement and development of the telephone art last year resulted in transatlantic radio telephone connections to Great Britain and long-distance service to the principal cities in Mexico, and Saskatchewan, Canada. Television, seeing by telephone, was also demonstrated before large audiences.

Emphasizing the necessity for transcontinental telephone service, a third cross country line was placed in operation between Minneapolis and Spokane, Seattle and Portland, Oregon, early in the year. This line supplements the original transcontinental line extending from New York to San Francisco and a southern route connecting New Orleans, Dallas, El Paso and Los Angeles. The latter line was opened to public service about four years ago.

Research and development devoted both to physical things and to methods of operation have been perhaps the most important basic factors in the phenomenal growth and general improvement in the quality of telephone service throughout the country. The gradual extension in the range of telephone communication (which, during 1927, was so vividly illustrated by the establishment of transatlantic telephone service) and such by-products of the telephone as the transmission of pictures by wire, are alike the products of telephone research.

Americans averaged 205 telephone calls last year. Miss Margaret Popkins seems pleased with this one.

Throughout the past year the Bell System research organization, comprising over 4,000 engineers, physicists, chemists and other scientists and their assistants, employed in the Bell Telephone Laboratories, Inc., and the Department of Development and Research of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, have continued their tireless search along many lines of technical investigation for adaptations and improvements in telephone apparatus and methods, whereby the speed, quality and economy of telephone service may be further enhanced.

It is a far cry from Alexander Graham Bell, working with one assistant in a Boston attic, where he discovered the principle of the telephone, to these highly organized groups devoted to research and development, which are constantly subjecting to the most minute scrutiny and investigation every phase of the science of communication which has to do with telephone service
