Romance Among "Down-and-Outs"

EVA slipped off her dainty afternoon frock of love-in-mist blue, hung it in her wardrobe and took down a cotton frock of dusty brown. The latter was a work frock—solely and simply a work frock—for Eva would soon be on her way toward Battery park and the coffee stall where nightly she dispensed hot coffee and sandwiches to the "down and outs" of that neighborhood.

Eva had rented the coffee stall and its equipment for a month and thoroughly enjoyed a fragment of life she had not hitherto known. Not that she had always known a degree of affluence. Eva had worked long and hard for the possession of the dainty flat and its comfortable furnishings which she now enjoyed.

Eva wasn't dispensing coffee because she loved being among the "down and outs," but simply because she must enlarge her scope for story writing. She wrote the type of stories that were gradually creeping into movie fields, and in return brought back increasingly large checks.

There was one other down in Battery park, also enlarging his mental outlook but his look was straying more toward the development of his romantic capacity. He was, in fact, casting many a glance of deep interest at the wide-eyed girl who seemed so thoroughly out of her element handing out coffee to the none too clean derelicts who lined up at her stall.

He fell to wondering, as he consumed endless cups of her coffee, just what kink of fate had put her where she was instead of in an exquisitely furnished drawing room—a far more fitting background than the row of hot dogs, chipped cups, and steaming coffee urns.

And the back of Eva's mind was not lacking in speculation regarding the young man in the shabby knickers and outrageous neckties.

She scoffed at the idea that he might be down there for the same purpose as herself—to study humanity in this stratum.

"Those things only happen in the movies and the lesser type of dime novel," she told herself, but she continued none the less her guarded study of him, telling herself firmly that she had chosen him as a type. She would catalogue him merely as an unusually attractive type of "down and outer" who must, at one time of his career, have been possessed of great opportunities. Eva knew, by the keen look in his eyes, that the hang-dog glance of the gutter inhabitant would never besmirch his countenance.

His language, on the other hand, was simply atrocious. Eva thought he must have taken lessons in the expert butchering of the king's English.

Eva came very near hitting the mark in her surmise, for young W. Owen James had spent many troubled hours in an endeavor to master a diction that would put him on a speaking level, as it were, with that element of human kind of which he was making a close study. His first play, produced on Broadway, had brought forth scathing criticism for his lack of characterization—the play itself being otherwise of great promise. Owen had closed his jaws with a click and gone about showing the critics that they would not say the same thing twice about his shortcomings.

His second play was nearing completion and before many days had passed James would cast off the physical and mental fuire of the derelict and revert to his natural element—that of scholar and gentleman.

Eva, for some unknown reason, always flung on a cloak of armor when James approached the stall with his confreres. Perhaps it was to guard herself since she was at a loss to know just where to catalogue him in her gallery of derelicts. She succeeded in baffling him as well as herself.

When rehearsals began for the new play, young James was forced away from the Battery by a need of his presence on Broadway.

Eva, too, had lodged the coffee-stall again with its rightful holder and repaired to her dainty apartment with a fine plot for the movies. Her typewriter clicked incessantly. Her heart, too, when it had time, thumped a dull tattoo, when the eyes of a certain "down-and-outer" intruded into her fast-moving plot. She couldn't forget him, and wondered if she had begun to lose her mind—pining for a bit of masculine driftwood from Battery park.

Eva went naturally, to the first night of the new play by W. Owen James.

The play received a rousing welcome. The author was called and stepped shyly out to thank his audience in words that prompted Eva to surmise that he had bathed his vocabulary in the limpid pools of the king's English so exquisite was his speech.

Turning his eyes toward the front rows, where all the critics seemed to have gathered, W. Owen James' speech suddenly halted, picked itself up and continued.

He had looked squarely into the wide eyes of Eva, an Eva in her rightful environment of intellect and chiffons.

His next play was a collaboration with much that was romantic woven into its successful lines.

Disturbed Water

"Rip tide" is the term applied to water roughened by cross currents.

Someone has observed that science is not worth what we pay for it. What is?

Angus—It cost MacChinch dear when he ground his teeth with rage at the officer who arrested him for driving too slow.

Sandy—How much did he have to pay?

Angus—Ten dollars to the judge and $10 to the dentist to patch up his set of teeth.
