Lesson VIII. May 25, 1902. Acts XIII, 43-52.

PAUL AT ANTIOCH IN PISIDIA.

Paul and Barnabas have completed the journey, the dangers of which led to the desertion of faint-hearted John Mark. They have passed barriers which even Alexander the Great found almost insurmountable—the "perils of waters;" the bridgeless streams, liable at any moment to become whirling floods; the "perils by robbers;" the mountain defiles, infested by the Pisidian brigands. But the journey was not altogether void of pleasant incident. In its early stages, no doubt, the missionaries enjoyed the happy summer exodus from the hot lowlands to the cool bench of the mountains, and were reminded of the march of the pilgrim caravans on their way to Zion, whither the tribes of the Lord go up. As they witness the sudden bursting forth of mountain torrents they call to mind the parable of Jesus about the building on the rock and sand. As they march between the brilliant crimson of the oleander, with which their way is hedged, the blessed theme of their preaching is momentarily suggested, the precious blood of the Lamb of God.

They are seated now with their fellow-countrymen and true proselytes in the synagogue of Pisidian Antioch. This populous city on the central tableland of Asia Minor, between Ephesus and the Cilician gates, has attracted a considerable colony of trafficking Jews, and they in turn have added to their numbers many devout and honorable women and chief men of the city. With what mingled emotion the apostle must have viewed this virgin soil, in which he had come so far and through such perils to sow the seed of the gospel!

As from a photograph, the very tones that woke the echoes of the Pisidian synagogue seem to ring out with all their original distinctness from the inspired volume. These are the very words Paul spoke, though not all he uttered on that occasion, of course. Well may Farrar call it "a great sermon." It is a masterpiece of persuasive eloquence—a real canon built of logic and rhetoric. We are taken back to the scenes, and are favored with a view of the very mental processes of the greatest of metaphysicians. This sermon is the veritable gem cell from which the Pauline epistles are evolved. Thirteen, if not fourteen (Hebrews) epistles are here in epitome. Israel's glorious history is forestalled by a master hand. A few strokes indicate the sovereign election of the fathers; Egyptian captivity and deliverance; the wilderness experience; the entrance of Canaan; two kings in contrast—Saul who must needs be removed, and David, who fulfilled all God's will—all this is by the way of preparation to the specific declaration of the Messiah's advent, which is rendered probable by the indisputable appearance of his forerunner. Here Paul skillfully anticipates the objection grounded in the rejection of Jesus by the hierarchy. He appeals to a council of higher rank than that to which the rulers at Jerusalem belong, the council of the holy prophets (Besser) and shows that Israel, by its very condemnation, was unconsciously fulfilling prophecy.

On the broad, imperishable basis of the suffering, death and resurrection of the Messiah he rests the glorious Christian doctrine of justification by faith, incidentally affirming the insufficiency of the law, and closes with a tender appeal and faithful warning. The sermon is followed by an impromptu inquiry-meeting, in which seekers are further instructed, and converts persuaded to continue.

THE TEACHER'S LANTERN.
Paul's method of address at Antioch contains a hint for Christian teachers of to-day. He found a middle ground between his hearers and himself, and made the most of it. He paved the way with greatest care to the proposition which would be apt to awaken an agnition. When he had done his utmost to disarm prejudice and win confidence, he stated his doctrine in specific terms, urged its acceptance and warned of the consequences of rejection.

John Mark, the deserter, unfortunately, has his lineal descendants in our day. The obstacles to aggressive Christian character and work to day are formidable as Pisidian bandits and torrents. The call is still for those who can endure hardness. The days of chivalry have come again, or rather have never ceased. But one faint-hearted deserter does not necessarily disqualify for future service. John Mark returned to the fray, and with such vigor as to win an encomium from Paul, whom he had so nettled by his dereliction. (3 Tim. iv, 11)

Too much one may read between the lines in Luke's abridged narrative! Two lines suffice to carry missionaries away over the Pisidian Mountains with all their perils, into the heart of Asia Minor. The imagination, guided by marginal references, commentaries, and accounts of modern travelers, must fill in the bleak outline.

The noblest epitaph one can think of may here be found. Of John Baptist it was said, "He fulfilled his course." See Robert Hall's sermon on the "Duty, Happiness, and Honor of Maintaining the Course Prescribed to us by Providence."

Scripturalness is a characteristic of Paul's sermon. Brief as it is, it contains several Biblical quotations.

It is worthy of remark that the once interest of Pharisees is most insistent upon the insufficiency of the law. This Paul iterates in his epistles in varying form and cumulative power.

Girls, don't be moody. The blues are after Nature's revolt against indolence. Fresh air, wholesome thoughts and cheery company are to be had by any girl, and the blues and moodiness flee at the sight of them.

Whooping Cough.

A woman who has had experience with this disease, tells how to prevent any dangerous consequences from it. She says: Our three-year-old boy, whooping cough last summer, our baby boy being only three months old, and owing to our giving them Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, they lost none of their plumpness and came out in much better health than other children whose parents did not use this remedy. Our oldest little girl would catch whooping cough every spring between whoops—JESSIE PRINCE, Hall, Springfield, Ala. This Remedy is for sale by M. A. Toulson, druggist, Chestertown, Md.
