CONQUERING FOOT AND MOUTH.

Barring one or two extremely regrettable features, the campaign against foot-and-mouth disease is well in hand; encouraging progress in some States, and a gratifying resumption of business at the stockyards and packing centers which for a fortnight were shut down.

Farmers realize they must work together systematically with their local veterinarians, so as to eliminate the possibility of spreading the infection and control the cases which have already been found. While many of the farmers and breeders have been opposed to the slaughter of whole herds, they were still more aroused when a rumor circulated that on account of infectious fluids the slaughtering of infected animals would be limited. The present situation in this respect is that animals actually infected will be slaughtered, judgment determining whether the whole herd must go. The hope is that by rigid quarantine methods many animals may be saved.

The conditions under which the stock yards were opened permitted the in-shipment of cattle for immediate slaughter, it being provided that they must be slaughtered within 36 hours after they were received. No fairs cattle, therefore, nor stockers, it being feared this would offer great opportunity for distributing infection to a wider area. Extra precautions are taken and all cattle received are thoroughly inspected at the unloading chute.

DOCTORS DISAGREE ON DISEASE.
Some veterinarians are at variance with the generally accepted method of battling the disease. For example, James Law, of Cornell University, in a newspaper article, does not favor whole-scale killing of infected animals. "It is well-known that under simple cleanliness," he writes in a newspaper article, "almost every case recovers in 14 days, and in one week more, with proper disinfection, is a sound animal." He believes quarantine the most essential of all restrictive measures, but it should be exclusion in wholesale surroundings.
He says fodder can be fed safely on the premises to the recovered and immuned animals. They must be kept under strictest quarantine until fodder has all been consumed. Quarantine must always be rigid to the last degree, but can be carried out much more easily in winter than in summer. Dr. Law believes it would be folly to adopt the method so common in Europe of selling the dressed carcass after the feet and head had been removed, but adds that under simple isolation and disinfection no such question should arise. In his experience dairy products of quarantined animals may be used harmlessly and profitably for feeding calves and swine if the milk is thoroughly boiled and milk vessels scalded or subjected to the action of live steam.

Much interest attaches to the experiment of keeping the National dairy show cattle under observation and medical treatment instead of slaughtering them. Nearly half the herd of 836 cattle had contracted the plague and not one animal has died. Practically every patient is recovering with small loss of flesh. The herd is valued at approximately $3,000,000 and is quarantined in the stock yards' amphitheater. Federal agents will examine those which have recovered from the disease to see if they still carry germs. Those which are found not to be "carriers" will be disinfected and returned to the home farms.

Be Careful.

She was smiling as they rode away, and a little while later she lay dead.
The automobile invited her, the day invited her, and so she went forth aglow with life and happiness, and she came home, cold in death. With a smile on her lips, and a jest half spoken, the grim spirit of Death reached out and cuddled her close. Within the automobile something slipped, something gave way, something refused to work, and in a quick second the machine was wrecked. Dazed, blood-covered, the man groped around and tried to grasp what had happened. Terribly mutilated the woman lay near. Out of sunshine and light had come darkness. Out of joy had been borne despair.

Up and down the county roads the automobiles dash. Dash down hill, dash around curves. And now and then dash against trees or over embankments, and the death list grows. Be careful. It is your turn next. Be careful. It is your sweatheart, your mother, your wife, your baby who will be crushed into the Beyond because of you. Be careful. You are not immortal. Your machine can break its steering gear, or throw a tire. Your flesh and blood offers no more resistance to Death than the other man's.

Be careful. Blow your horn. Proceed at a moderate speed. Slow up on all bad curves. Go down hill cautiously. Give the pedestrian, the wagon, the other automobiles lots of room. Watch the road in front of you. Be careful. Better to bury your adventurous spirit—than your dead.—New Era.
