TO STOP TAKING OF UPPER BAY OYSTERS.

Commander Howard May Prohibit Further Removal Because Market is Glutted.

TELLS OF TRANSPLANTING.

Says 4,300 Bushels Dumped Overboard on Depleted Bed Yielded 8,000 Bushels in Two Years.

Owing to the market having become glutted, Commander T. C. E. Howard of the State Fishery Force has declared his intention of prohibiting the further taking of oysters in the upper waters of the Chesapeake bay, where, for the first time in 16 years, there has been a plentiful supply of bivalves.

The oysters in the upper Chesapeake, according to Commander Howard, are exceptionally fat and splendidly suited for steaming purposes. Since he announced that the beds might be worked, between 60 and 100 vessels, dredgers and runboats have been making the most of the opportunity and have carried to the market thousands of bushels of oysters.

PACKERS PREFER THEM. Many of the oysters caught in the waters referred to have been undersize—fully 50 per cent. thereof, it is said—but Commander Howard asserts that the rest have been in such splendid condition that the packers prefer them to all others for their particular purpose.

Commander Howard declares that by allowing the upper bay oysters to be caught employment was given in the packing houses to many additional persons—many of them women of apparent respectability, who earned on an average of $1.25 a day.

Commander Howard also has an interesting story to tell about the removal of some of the small oysters from the upper bay to points lower down, where better conditions, particularly deeper water and more abundant food supply for oysters, prevail.

FIRST STATE TRANSPLANTING. The first transplanting under State authority was done about three years ago. At that time it had been years since any fat oysters had been taken from the upper bay beds and the authorities were beginning to believe that locality had seen its day as an oyster-producing ground.

The water is shallow in that section. Consequently the Susquehanna floods not only made the bay water fresh but also brought down great quantities of mud which covered the oysters. Generally the hot August sun finished the work the floods had begun, with the result that such oysters as managed to keep alive were so small and poor they were unfit for use.

One day the suggestion was made to the late Austin L. Crothers, then Governor, that it might prove a profitable experiment if some of these small oysters were taken up early in the spring and transferred to some place where they could get plenty of food and be out of the danger of floods and hot sun.

DUMPED ON DEPLETED BEDS. He consented, and though the dredging season was closed Commander Howard went upon the upper bay grounds, took up 4,300 bushels of small oysters and carried them down the bay to Dare's Wharf, Calvert county, where he dumped them overboard on a depleted bed. Now listen to what he says:

"In the first place it was absolutely against the law to take up these oysters with dredges, but Governor Crothers gave me permission to do so and I went to work. I believed it would pay the State and the results have shown that my judgment was correct.

"That 4,300 bushels of oysters when taken up about two years later yielded approximately 8,000 bushels of excellent oysters that sold for an average of 92 cents a bushel. The oystermen had to pay the State 5 cents a bushel for them to defray the expense of transplanting.

"Last spring we transplanted to these same grounds in Calvert county 114,000 bushels of small oysters from the upper bay and when the beds are opened to the oystermen about this time next year I fully expect the yield to amount to 500,000 bushels. I was down there a short while ago and took up some of the planted oysters. They are doing remarkably well—growing rapidly and are fat and fine."

DOING WELL ON MUD BOTTOM.

Commander Howard went on to say that last spring he dumped some of the oysters on a mud bottom to see whether they would live. He found them not only alive but he thinks that, if anything, they are doing better than those dumped on solid ground.

Because the State is doing the transplanting, when the beds are thrown open they are opened to the entire public. That is, anyone can go there and take them. The Commander, however, is very careful to keep a guard on the grounds until he is ready to throw the beds open.

He says the oystermen have not made a single complaint of being prohibited from taking oysters on these planted grounds between the time they were dumped overboard and the time of opening up the beds. Knowing that eventually they will be allowed to take them they are willing to wait until the oysters are full grown.

MILD WINTER PREDICTED.

Caterpillars' Coats Give Baymen Clue To Future Weather.

[From the New York Tribune] This is to be a mild winter, according to baymen of Little Neck Bay. They have watched the caterpillars and then formed their conclusions on the following basis:

If a caterpillar comes from its cocoon white, plenty of snow will follow. If a caterpillar is brown the winter will be mild.

If a caterpillar is dark there will be unsettled weather. The baymen have been unable to find any but brown caterpillars.
