Judge Hopper Dead

Judge P. B. Hopper, associate of the Second Judicial Circuit of Maryland, died at 5 o'clock Thursday afternoon at his home in Centreville. Suffering with a paralytic stroke Sunday, Judge Hopper grew weaker each day. His death came as a shock to the community, as he was well and favorably known over the entire circuit. For many years he was one of the most brilliant lawyers of the Eastern Shore and appeared often in the Court of Appeals.

Judge Hopper was born in Queen Anne's county March 25, 1853. He was a grandson of the late Judge T. B. Hopper, a circuit court judge and prominent politician. His father was the late T. B. Hopper. His mother was Henrietta Goldsborough. Judge Hopper received his early education at the Centreville Academy and St. John's College. In March, 1871, he entered Western Md. College and was graduated in 1874. He began the study of law at Centreville and was admitted to practice in 1878, continuing until 1883, when he was elected State's Attorney.

At the expiration of his term as State's Attorney, Judge Hopper resumed his practice of law and at the death of Judge Brown in 1906 was appointed to the judgeship. He was elected to fill the vacancy in 1907.

Judge Hopper stood high in the Masonic order.

He is survived by a widow, who was Miss Elizabeth Keating, daughter of W. D. Keating, and two sisters, Mrs. F. S. McFeeley, of Centreville, and Mrs. W. E. Thompson, of Baltimore.

Funeral services will be held at 4 o'clock today from Grace M.E. Church, interment in Chesterfield cemetery.
