Automobile Accidents In The U. S.

Automobile accidents in the United States in 1921 caused the death of 12,500 persons—one person killed every 42 minutes, day and night. More than 300,000 persons were injured. The fatalities on our highways last year were more than the American dead in the Spanish-American War, while the injured far outnumbered our 221,000 wounded in the World War. That the automobile hazard is growiong steadily is shown by the fact that, although accidents on the railroads are decreasing, automobile crashes in 1921 increased 4 per cent over 1920.

In 1920 observers at Baltimore and Ohio railroad crossing noted 398,000 vehicles and 25,000 drivers failed to take any precautions at highway crossings. In one month of this year 16,177 automobiles were checked by the railroad's observers and 2,972 drivers were reported as having failed to stop, look or listen before crossing the tracks.

The impression prevails in some quarters that asphalt pavements are slippery, especially when wet, and consequently are dangerous to drive over. A three-months' investigation recently made in Maryland disclosed the fact that 90 per cent of the automobile accidents are due to speeding.

In Memoriam

In sad but loving remembrance of our dear daughter, Bertha Mae Cox, who departed this life Sept. 17, 1908.

Like unto a rose was she who has gone,
Only a bud, yet half grown,
Death's shears clipped her from lifes vine,
Not our will, oh Lord, but Thine.

Weep not for me because I died so young,
The fewer the years, the fewer the sins.
God's will must be done.

BY HER MOTHER AND FATHER.

You ask us why we are downcast,
Why we whisper your sweet name
Only those who have lost a sister
Know the anguish of our pains.

BY HER SISTERS AND BROTHERS.
