SALISBURY PROSPEROUS

Big Building Boom During The Year Just Past

The $250,000 mark was again passed in building activities within the corporate limits of Salisbury during the year ending December 31, according to valuations placed upon buildings for which permits were granted at the City Hall. Though in the aggregate this amount is below the 1921 estimate, the expenditures during the past year covered greater improvements and a much larger number of structures.

Permits show that approximately $270,913 was devoted to the building trades in the city alone, against $378,060 in 1921 and $196,820 in 1920. The unusual amount expended in 1921 includes permits for the erection of the new Methodist Protestant Church and additions to the Peninsular General Hospital, each estimated at $100,000.

Practically all the buildings for which permits have been issued at the City Hall, with the exception of three or four dwellings, have been completed. One hundred and sixty-six building permits were issued, showing an increase of 33 over 1921.

A total of 33 dwelling and tennant houses, constructed of various kinds of building material and ranging in costs as high as $20,000, were erected, exceeding the number erected the previous year by six. Permits granted for dwelling improvements, such as repairing and erecting additions, totaled 46.

The use of automobiles seem to keep pace with the growth of the city, for a total of 43 private garages, the exact number as in the previous year, were built at an average cost of about $132.25; and commercial garages, at a cost of $12,000.

The largest outlay for building during the year was devoted to the erecting of mechanical establishments and additions. The total construction cost of the former was approximately $76,000 and of the latter, $44,400. Practically all of the material used in the construction of these buildings was terra cotta and brick.

PERIL OF SWINE RAISERS

Raisers Must Use Every Precaution To Be Successful In Their Raising

The cooperative Extension Work Department, in Agriculture and home economics of the University of Maryland, is launching a campaign for the prevention of hog cholera. Through the papers they wish to make a special appeal to the individual farmer, as it is realized that no matter how much energy is expended by federal or State departments, the success of the movement rests upon the individual effort of those who are interested. Below is quoted the message which the department would have studied:

In these times when drives for various causes are the fashion and our citizens are almost daily confronted with some additional appeal, we are not likely to take kindly to any new acquisition to the ranks of any such campaigns.

In contrast to the majority of such drives, however the campaign to make 1923 a Hog Cholera prevention Year is unique in that it does not have the raising of a certain sum of money as its goal and in fact contemplates no financial outlay on those whom it is designed to benefit; that is the swine raisers and farmers of Maryland.

In announcing teh inauguration of this unique campaign Dr. I. K. Ather ton, inspector in charge of Cholera work, is appealing for the cooperation of swine raisers of the State.

It is stated that many persons still retain the opinion that hog Cholera is introduced into a community and spreads in a very mysterious and unaccountable way and that the disease is difficult to combate for that reason. However the work done in Maryland to date has afforded some very postive data regarding the introduction, harboring and spread of the infection. This data is incorporated in the points enumerated below, problems which if they could be solved, would go a long way toward eliminating hog cholera from Maryland.

1. A large percentage of the primary or original outbreaks of hog cholera can be traced to infection introduced through feeding garbage, kitchen scraps or swill to hogs.

2. The introduction of new hogs or the movement of swine without due care is frequently responsible for hog cholera outbreaks.

3. The failure to report outbreaks of sickness among swine to the proper authorities so that an investigation may be made, frequently results in a serious spread of the disease.

4. The failure to promptly and properly dipose of carcasses of animals especially swine that die of hog cholera, is greatly responsible for the dissemination of the disease.

5. The failure of swine raisers to have their hogs protected by inoculation with anti hog cholera serum when warning has been issued that a probability of exposure exists, results in many outbreaks which could be avoided.

The solving of these problems is to be the object of this campaign, and if farmers and swine raisers would render the proper assistance there can be no doubt as to the result.

Federal and State authorities can lay plans for the eradication of this disease, but the sucessful accomplishments of its task rests with the indivilual farmer. It is for him to determine whether hog cholera is to continue to take its annual toll. But as can be pointed out again, it is not for him to make any financial outlay to carry out these plans. It would seem therefore, that this campaign is destined to be a popular one.

WASHINGTON COLLEGE

The Washington College Cotillion Club held its Winter Hop in the college gymnasium Friday, Jan. 5.

The decorating committee included A. A. Stoufer, '25, chairman; J. T Blake, 26; and N. Conant, '26. The music was furnished by the Como Morimba Orchestra of Cambridge, Md.

January 4, the specials beat the Sophomores by the score of 32 to 15. January 6 the Freshmen defeated the Seniors by 25 to 11, and the same day the Freshmen were also on the bigger end of the score 32 to 6 against the Preps. January 10 the Sophomores beat the Preps 14 to 8, and the Specials beat the Seniors 13 to 5.

The following represents the standing of the teams to date.

	Won	Lost	Pct
Specials	4	0	1000
Freshmen	4	1	800
Juniors	2	1	800
Sophomores	2	2	500
Seniors	0	4	000
Preps	0	4	000

After each class has played five games the series will begin again. Competition amongst the classes has so far been very keen, and growing greater every day. Each student watches daily the shifting of the places amongst their respective teams. Whenever there is a game the entire student body turns out to witness it and each side cheers for its team. The games themselves are extremely interesting, since there are numerous good players amongst the class teams.

Mr. Hiram S. Brown, of the Board of Visitors and Governors appeared before the Student Council January 16 and proposed several amendments to its constitution, which were favorably accepted by the Council.

The Board of Visitors and Governors met Wednesday night, Jan. 17.
