Staying Power!

Delsie Downs stood on the corner of the road at the turnpike waiting for the four o'clock stage to pass. When the old stage driver reined up his horses to take in his passengers a look of surprise came over his face. As he took Delsie's valise in his hand and held the stage door open for her to get in, he asked: "Going visiting, Delsie?"

There were no other passengers that afternoon, and, as the young girl had known the old stage driver all her life, she was glad to have some one to unburden her heart to.

"I don't know, Mr. Davis, where I shall fetch up. I've started for the city. I've made up my mind that it is time for me to start somewhere. The truth is that I cannot stand Aunt Mandy's aggravating ways another hour."

The driver kept drumming on his dashboard while Delsie was talking. When she finished, he said: "What's your Aunt 'Mandy going to do without you?"

"That's her lookout, Mr. Davis. She never appreciated anything I did for her. I didn't mind the work; I could get on with that well enough, but she is so unreasonable and fussy that she keeps me stirred up all the while. I want to go and work somewhere where folks are pleasant. Many times I've gone upstairs and packed up my things, and said to myself: 'Now I'll go to the city and get a situation; I won't stay and be imposed upon another hour.' But when I began to pack up, I'd wonder what Aunt 'Mandy would do without me, for nobody else would go there and put up with her ways. Then I'd make up mind to bear it a spell longer. But today she tantalized me so much that I just made up my mind that I'd go on, and I'm going."

"Your Aunt 'Mandy must have took on bad when you left, Delsie."

"She didn't know it, Mr. Davis. I'm so chicken-hearted that if I told her I was really going, and she made a fuss, I'd be just foolish enough to take off my things and stay."

"You've done first-rate for the old lady, Delsie. All the folks in town will agree to that."

"Why didn't any of them say so when they came in and knew I was so tired? When anybody is trying to stand up under a crushing load, it wonld lighten it a good deal, I'm thinking, if somebody came in and gave a lift by a few words of encouragement. If the folks thought I was doing anything worthy of mention, why didn't they tell me so once in a while? It would have helped me to endure it all."

"Well, that's just what they ought to have done, Delsie. But I suppose they took it for granted that you knew you were doing good work. Folks take too much for granted in this world."

"What a fuss folks made over Agnes Wilcox when she came home from college with the prize. And what a time there was over Lucy Whitcomb, Mr. Davis, when she came home visiting after she started that dressmakers' shop in the city and did so well. That man who lectured at the school-house last winter talked about going to work and finding out what there is in us, what strength of character we've got, and what we're capable of doing."

"Well, now, Delsie, let me tell you it ain't half so hard to march behind the music as it is to trudge along without any tune. It takes lots more strength and Christain grace to put up with an aggravating body like your Aunt 'Mandy than it does to go out and work where other folks are stirring about lively. We all get tumbled up and down in our mind sometimes. John Bunyan said he did, and he was about as good a man as we've heard tell of. Delsie, you're running away from the place the Lord laid out for you. There's nobody that'll do for your Aunt 'Mandy as you have. Your mother thought a sight of her—she was her only sister—and when she died of the fever, your Aunt 'Mandy took you home. You were only a baby, and she has done the best she could for you. It's all because of those infirmities of the flesh she's got that she's so trying. What would any of us be if we'd been bedridden for ten years? It takes more strength of character and Christain grace to have staying power than it does going power, child. Hadn't you better get right off here and run back to your work cross the lots, slip up the back stairs and take off your Sunday clothes, put on your workaday dress again, and kneel down and ask that He give you staying power? There are lots of folks' names written up in Heaven who never make any noise in the world—folks like you that are set off in corners and lonely places, doing some important work for the Lord, of a kind that don't set 'em up much, may be, but they'll be better known by and by. Want to get off Delsie?"

"Yes, Mr. Davis; I guess I'd better go back, and to stick to my place a spell longer."

"Pray for staying power, Delsie. I'll bring your bag around when I come back from the station to-night."

Two years passed—Aunt 'Mandy had accomplished the warfare with the ills of the flesh. The small amount of property left had been willed to Delsie, but it was going to be necessary for her to earn something to add to it. The place was advertised to be sold at auction, and Delsie sat alone the evening before the sale, wondering what she was going to do. A knock at the door caused her to look up and see the old stage-driver standing on the threshold.

"Good evening, Delsie. I came around to tell you about two lady passengers I had today. They came from the city and are going to bid on this place tomorrow, and make what they call a 'Working Girls' Rest' of it. They asked me if I could recommend any good young woman who would take charge of it for 'em; they said somebody that had a faculty for getting along with folks' odd ways and peculiarities. I told 'em, 'Delsie Downs is just the one for you. She's got lots of staying power in her.'"

And that is the way that the name of Delsie Downs has become, duriug the past few years, so sweet to many a weary city worker who found new strength and cheer by a few weeks' stay at "Good Rest." Her corner of death is no more a lonely, unknown one. It is one of God's beautiful hospices which make the way to the Celestial City so much easier of many a travel-worn pilgrim.
