Curley's Rescues.

By HENRY ROSSMORE. Copyrighted, 1908, by P. C. Eastman.

Benly, racing down the street, brought himself up with a jerk as a gong sounded out its brazen alarm. Then he hurried toward the building with the great wide doors in the middle of the block.

The gong was still sounding, and now could be heard the tramp of feet and hoofs, the jingle of metal work upon the wooden floor as the fire horses returned to their stalls.

Benly's face fell. Somewhere in the city horses were dashing madly over the pavements in their race to answer an alarm, but here the great green doors would remain closed. It was only a practice hitch for Thirteen company.

In the summer time practice hitches were the best fun, for the doors stood wide open, and he could watch the men as they put the harness trip in order again and lifted the great straps off the three big grays. Then, too, the firemen lounged in front of the house, and he could hear them talking about the fires they had gone to, brave tales of valorous fights that lost nothing in the telling.

Benly trotted down the street again to his own doorstep and carefully backed himself into the vestibule. His shrill treble rose in imitation of the alarm, but here the great green doors would remain closed. It was only a practice hitch for Thirteen company.
