AN ENJOYABLE CRUISE.

On Board Canoe Bertha on Sassafras River.

July 24, 1901.

Editor KENT NEWS:

According to promise I will now try while the captain is doing the trick at paddling, to write you an account of our trip. We left Wilmington on the thirteen foot canoe "Bertha" on Monday, July 22, at 5.45 a. m, with Captain, Singleton and crew of one (myself.) Our canoe is schooner rigged. but we found the sails a superfluous burden, as we encountered head winds as soon as we got out of the Christianna creek on to the Delaware, and they remained head the entire trip. If you are not a sailor I will explain that head winds means the wind blowing the opposite way, no matter if you are going north, south, east or west. So it means use the paddles until 11 a. m., when we beached the canoe, lurched on a sandbar just north of Delaware City, which is the entrance to the Delaware and Chesapeake canal.

We embarked again and entered the canal at 12.30 having paddled 16 miles carried the boat around the locks, and were there held up by the official in charge of the locks, with a bill for $1.50. As we had a permit to use the canal, from the Phila., office we refused to pay, but the official insisted that our permit said we might use the canal. It did not say to use it free, and when asked if it were necessary to have a permit when we paid said "no" and when further asked what the permit was for, said "to use the canal." So we had to give it up after vainly trying to get telephone communication with the Phila., office, and paid under protest, but have since learned it will be refunded. So after delay of one hour we started on through the picturesque canal, carrying the canoe around the locks at St. George, four miles pushing on, sometimes paddling and then taking turns at towing along the towpath.

There is an old legend that when a paper hanger dies he turns into a mule, but here was two paperhangers doing the act while alive. About 8.30, while I was doing mule duty the captain excitedly called to me to pull him to the bank, as we had reached the narrowest part of the canal, which varies from ¼ mile to thirty feet, and it was pitch dark, so we had not seen a steamer until it got right on to us, as they have to go very quietly. The captain scrambled out and giving a yank with his big right arm the boat came out like a flash, just in time. We were then in a predicament. We couldn't see if we had torn the canvas, of which the canoe was made. We did not think it safe to launch her again so we hid her in the bushes and as a heavy storm had now come up, tramped a mile and a half to a wayside inn, where we slept the sleep of the weary until 4 a. m., July 23, when we returned to the canoe, cooked and ate breakfast and started on, reaching Chesapeake City, nine miles, the last lock, at 8 a. m. We carried the boat around the lock into what is called the back creek, a stream about the width of the Schuylkill, down which we went about four miles to the Elk River, landed in a cool spot and cooked dinner, and off again by 11.30. We reached the grand old Chesapeake at Turkey Point, 7 miles, at 5 o'clock. Having now tide and wind against us we made slow progress and finally reached Grove's Point, six miles more, at 8.30. The grand view from here paid for all our hard work of paddling 46 miles.

We landed on the Point, which is just opposite Betterton, where Shrigley and Gaul and Grayson are spending their vacation. We built a huge fire from some of the immense quantities of drifwood strewn along the beach, made our coffee, put up a tent and laid down to sleep. But the mosquitos had made other arrangements, so we started the fire again and lay in the smoke of it, and waited for morning, covering ourselves up with the sails, as it was cool, a strong wind from a neighboring storm having sprung up. And while we lay there looking up at the stars and holding the sails down to the sand, so as to keep them from blowing away, I could not help wondering if five miles across the bay at Betterton, Leight and Harry and Walter were looking at the stars, holding on to something for fear she would get away.

We started again at 4 a. m. this morning up the beautiful Sassafras River, really the most beautiful river I have ever had the pleasure of seeing, and now at 10 a. m. are approaching Georgetown, a little village 12 miles up from the bay, where we will get some lunch, our supply of provisions having been exhausted, and will then proceed three miles above to Wilson's Point, where our friends will be waiting for us, and having paddled 61 miles, will end the first part of a very enjoyable and picturesque trip.

I do not know how soon you will get this as as I can't tell when we will get near a post office.

Yours truly,
S. M. G.

THE Easton Ledger, of Thursday, had a severe arraignment, yet a truthful one, of Senator Louis McComas as a boss. It begins with his leaving the bench of the District of Columbia, and traces his record hurriedly up to the late Republican State convention, when he had his kinsmen, Herman Platt, the head of a gigantic oyster trust, nominated for Comptroller. The Ledger goes a little further, and predicts that McComas' purpose is to have Sidney Mudd, whose name was frequently mentioned by the government's attorneys during the census frauds trials, chosen Senator to succeed Wellington, should he be able to get his clutches on the Legislature.
