The Old Way of Imparting Knowledge.

[From the Baltimore Sun.]

Schoolboys throughout Maryland will be pained to note a decision of the Circuit Court for Kent County asserting the legality of the time-honored method of imparting knowledge by means of the birch. In one of the public schools of that delightful county, where peach switches are abundant even if birches are scarce, the teacher dusted the coat of a refractory pupil by means of a rod. The parents of the boy had the teacher arrested upon a warrant charging her with assault and battery, but the Court decided that the teacher was acting well within her constitutional and legal rights. Nothing is more common than for judges, in their conservatism and love for precedent, to forget that they started life as little boys. It is not at all unlikely that all three of the venerable judges who sat on the bench and decided this case made a practice in early life of going to school with the seats of their trousers reinforced with geographies. In those old days the rod and the ruler were esteemed as essential in any scheme of education as the text-books. Solomon was the great apostle of the rod. He had something like a thousand wives, and, allowing five children to the wife, which was far below the average in those days, there were no less than five thousand children in this remarkable family. A breakfast table with one man, one thousand women and five thousand children all gathered around it at one time, the former all talking at once in a discussion of the latest social doings in the Jerusalem Four Hundred and the latter all asking for biscuits, and then Solomon's predilection for the rod may be understood. He enforced his views by precept upon precept, line upon line. "A rod," he said, "is for the backs of fools," and a schoolboy can be the worst kind of a fool. "He that spareth the rod hateth his son." "Foolishness is bound up in the heart of a child, but the rod of correction shall drive it away." "The rod and reproof give wisdom." "Withhold not correction from the child; for if thou beatest him with the rod he shall not die."

* * * * *

But, after making due allowance for Solomon in his plea for the rod, is he not right after all, and was not the Kent county court right in following the wise King? In the days when these judges went to school flogging was the rule, and it is not unlikely that each of them has this fact impressed upon his memory in the most painful manner. It may be that without the peach switch not one of them would ever have reached the bench. It is greatly to be doubted whether any boy who never got a flogging from his parents or his teachers has ever yet become President of the United States. Foolishness is bound up in the heart of a boy, and no certain way of driving it out of him, except by the switch, has ever been devised. And in the strenuous day of old, when the beneficial results of flogging were universally esteemed, the men who were raised were probably as good as those who are growing up under milder rule. The days are fast coming when the agent of some society will arrest women for beating eggs or for having whipped cream on the table. It is not at all unlikely that there will be a law to prohibit musicians from beating time. It is evident that the Kent county court has not yet caught up with the modern Sunday-school methods of imparting an education. It is just possible that they may agree with Uncle Remus that you can "teach a nigger more learning with a bar'l stave than you can with a spelling book."

THE "BIGGEST EAR" OF CORN.

Grown in Iowa Last Year and Had 1680 Grains on the Cob.

[From the Kansas City Star.]

To the Star: I am pleased to see the reports of large ears of corn from different parts of the country.

Now, you may tell all these "boosters" to look again. I am proud to say I have an ear of corn with 30 rows of grains around it and 56 grains lengthwise, making in all 1680 grains on one cob.

This ear of corn grew on the Marsh Halloway farm in Fremont county, Iowa, in the season of 1901. Now, all you please keep quiet until you have something better.

And "you fellow from Missouri," I can "show" you the corn if you are interested. Yours very truly, C. H. Cleveland, Tulsa, I. T.

The Business Sense Makes Home Happier.

Look at that affectionate monomaniac in "The Confessions of a Wife!" From nadir to zenith; from center to circumference, there is love, love, love, nothing but love. This young woman apparently has no knowledge, interest or ambition in life, save as refers to this man. Him she does not love for any human value, or at least he is not described as performing noble acts; it is simply the basic attraction of male and female. The man has other occupations, such as are afforded by the duties and opportunities of his profession. The woman, having none of these, revolves all day among her emotions, and the universe is rose-color or indigo according to them. Now, if this young woman had had a business of any kind, she would, in the first place, have had a different kind of mind; and in the second place, she would have had resources outside her broken heart.

A woman who is trained to act as well as to feel does not exaggerate her sensations so extremely. That is where some kind of helpful work in a business way for each woman applies directly and wholly to the happiness of marriage.

The business sense gained in any kind of useful work in the world makes a woman better able to judge a man before she marries him, and better able to get on with him afterward. It also—and this, too, is important—makes her able to get on with herself and the rest of tht world.
