Thanksgiving On Board a Man-of-war

THANKSGIVING and Fourth of July are in the same class on United States battleships. Both are holidays for the jackies. Both are celebrated with games and sports. Turkey and cranberry sauce are the only things which differentiate the last Thursday in November from the United States seaman's Fourth of July, when all the men in the navy put on their Sunday clothes, have a big feast and are not compelled to work.

With the dawn of Thanksgiving day on a United States battleship, regardless of whether she is in Manchurian waters or skirting the coast of the isthmus of Panama, all colors are thrown to the wind. Great American flags are raised to each of the mastheads and lines of brilliant signal flags extend from the prow and stern to the mastheads. The decks are washed down and made shipshape, flags are draped all over the mess rooms and in every part of the officers' quarters, and at noon the privilege to all parts of the ship is extended to the crew, and the real celebration begins.

The government makes no special allowance for a Thanksgiving dinner, but the men look after that themselves. Each mess provides a spread which is usually served on tables which are decorated with flowers and plants, which give it the appearance of a New England dinner table, as near as is possible in the out of the way corners of the earth where the boys happen to have their Thanksgiving celebration. Plum duff, turkey and mince pie are called upon to supply a Thanksgiving atmosphere to the greatest feast of the year in the navy.

Even on Thanksgiving day the men on board battleships are not supposed to have any liquor, but skillful smuggling frequently adds the necessary brandy to the sailors' spread. Twenty years ago one of the United States battleships lay in Naples bay on Thanksgiving day. Strict orders had been issued against liquor, and all the men had been warned not to attempt to get any grog aboard. The messes sent representatives ashore to provide the provisions for the dinner and brought back baskets filled with food which passed inspection. Roasted turkeys done to a tempting brown and stuffed with oysters had a prominent place in the baskets.

A FRIENDLY SPARRING MATCH.

Before the dinner was ended hilarity greater than turkey is capable of producing attracted the attention of officers, and Jimmy Legs, master at arms, was called upon to stop the noise. His efforts were in vain, and officers began a search in the hope of finding the cause of the unusual mirth. A raid was made on the pantries, and an examination of several of the well browned turkeys showed that a thin layer of oyster dressing concealed skins filled with enough liquor to give several ships' crews a rousing celebration.

After dinner the men have the freedom of the vessel. Smoking is permitted everywhere, and for a few hours the ordinary seaman is allowed to lounge in the best seats the ship affords and to smoke cigars which would do credit to the officers' quarters. If the vessel is near the shore the afternoon is usually devoted to baseball games, foot races and football. If the battleship happens to be where shore privileges cannot be granted the ship's deck becomes the recreation ground, and three legged races, potato races, obstacle races, rope climbing contests, boxing and other athletic events are engaged in.

Boat races are also a popular diversion on Thanksgiving day. Prizes are offered by the officers for the successful crews and individual performers, and the men overcome the stupor of a heavy dinner in their effort to show superior oarsmanship.

In the days when Tom Sharkey was Jimmy Legs on the Philadelphia boxing was one of the chief sports with the men in the navy, but now the youngsters who aspire to prize ring honors are discouraged by older men who are given to saying, "I used to be Sharkey's sparrin' pardner."—Washington Times.

Used to Be a Calling Day.

In the middle of last century it was fashionable, and therefore customary, to make calls. Thanksgiving day rivaled New Year's day in this respect. Society folk dined at noon and then held receptions.
