HARVEST-TIME IN THE WEST

The harvest time is the period of supreme activity throughout a large proportion of our great West. It is in a sense the climax and test of the whole year's work, and not only does it necessitate the hardest labor for the farmer and his helpers, as for his wife and daughters, but it is a season of worries and anxieties, for the ever-dreaded rain may play havoc with the gathering of the sheaves. The always interesting story of the harvest finds its most picturesque portrayal each year on the great wheat farms of the West—sources of the world's food supply.

East of the Mississippi, the average farmer has not been wont to put all his eggs in one basket. He raises wheat of course, perhaps putting many acres into this most important grain; but he also raises fruit and vegetables. He may have several fields of corn, and may also give some attention to stock raising and to poultry. Not so the "bonanza farmer" of the wheat empire. His entire holding—and it may be as large as a score of Eastern farms—is put into wheat and nothing else.

The owner or manager of a big wheat farm in the West has his hands full. The only way he can ever hope to get through with his gigantic harvesting successfully, is to make the most careful and detailed plans long in advance This is especially necessary, because thousands of acres of wheat must be harvested almost simultaneously. Of course, the grain must not be cut ere it is ripe, yet, on the other hand, to allow it to stand after it has ripened, means a loss both in weight and quality. The only way out of the difficulty is to provide harvesting out fits so powerful and so numerous that the whole herculean undertaking is accomplished in less time than the old-fashioned farmer devoted to gleaning the yield from a few small fields

Most marvelous of all the methods for rapid harvesting is the employment of the ponderous steam harvesters which are now used, to the exclusion of all slower utilities, in many notable wheat raising districts, such as the famous San Joaquin Valley, in California. One of the wonderful machines, cutting a swath eighteen feet wide, will harvest 150 acres per day. Not only does it cut the wheat and thresh it, but in the one operation it also cleans the grain and sacks it. The reader can readily imagine that with a number of these powerful steam harvestors co-operating, no great length of time is required to get in the grain, even on farms where the 5,000 acre wheat field is not unknown. Moreover, it is customary to have two "shifts" of men, so that the harvester does not cease its operations at nightfall; but goes on its devouring way by the light of the moon, or the illumination of torches, and thus, within twenty-four hours the wheat may be shorn from nigh three hundred acres by a single harvester.

The steam harvester, however, requires reasonably level land, and this impels many wheat growers in the more or less hilly country of the Northwest to continue their allegiance to harvesters drawn by horses. These machines, however, would hardly be recognized as ever big brothers of the time-honored, crimson-hued thresher that have been a familiar sight, time out of mind, on the small Eastern farms, not one of which requires more than two, or at most four horses for its operation. The up-to-date monarch of the Western wheat fields require from thirty-two to forty horses to draw it, and when these giants advance several abreast upon the golden stronghold, they clear a path with a width equal to the height of the average church steeple.

The thirty to forty-horse harvester ranks with the steam harvester in its ability to save time and labor; it cuts the standing grain, threshes, throws the straw into a receiver at the back of the machine, and pours the grain into sacks, which men, sitting inside the machine, sew up and toss into wagons driven along side the harvester as it moves forward, and which in turn hurry the sacks of grain to the elevators or to railroad cars on some nearby siding, to rush the wheat to the flour mills or to the ships that will carry it over the sea. One of the harvesters will cut and thresh about forty acres per day. It is not unusual to see diagonal lines of two dozen or perhaps double that number of machines eating their way across the waving yellow sea. Whatever be the means employed, the owner of a bonanza wheat farm can scarcely expect to complete his harvesting in less than ten days.

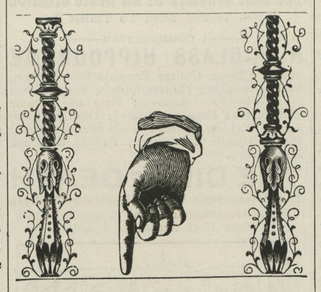

The farmers of the wheat empire beyond the Mississippi pay each year, to have their wheat harvested, an aggregate of nearly $4,000,000. This goes, for the most part, to an army of upward to fifty thousand harvest hands. Some of these harvest workers are college boys, earning money during the vacation to pay for his education; but most of them are husky young fellows from the towns and villages of the Middle West. They make a business of this harvest work, starting in early in the season in the South and gradually working northward, so that they manage to keep busy during the greater part of the summer. Sometimes the wages paid reach as high as $5 per day, but $2 per day and board is the usual rate, The thrifty hand can save practically all his money.

Harvest time makes much extra work for the women folks on a great wheat ranch. The owner of a wheat farm that is too big for one man to look after, has his lieutenants or division superintendents to direct the work of the various harvesting crews, and these officers of the grain-gathering army are usually entertained at the ranch house. The rank and file of the harvest hands "camp out" around kitchens on wheels, which are moved from place to place, after the fashion of gypsy habitations, as the crews travel from one farm to another.
