NOW THEY KNOW A COON

British Officers Attend a Mammoth and Exciting Hunt—Four Coons and a Possum.

Annapolis, Md., Nov. 4.—The officers of Prince Louis' squadron know now what a real coon hunt is. They realize the joy there is in following the dogs and what satisfaction there is when the coon is treed, for a lot of them, with a big crowd of American officers, attended Friday night what was probably the biggest and most exciting coon hunt that Anne Arundel county has ever heard of.

When they were invited to the hunt their ideas on what it was were rather hazy.

"I say, old chap, is this bally coon hunt anything like a lynching?"

The hunters left the Naval Academy about 6 P. M. in a fine drizzle. They were in launches, some of which were from the Naval Academy, some from the American ships and some the steam pinnaces of the British. The British were expectant and the Americans were enthusiastic. There were a few civilians with them, among them being Mayor Douw, of Annapolis.

About three-quarters of an hour before a launch, in which were Prof. N. M. Terry and Commander Howard, of the Naval Academy, the originators and promoters of the idea; John Knadler, one of the greatest coon hunters in Maryland; Messrs. Stahle and Herold, also hunters; Knadler's two sons and the dogs, went up to the scene of the start. Twenty bushels of oysters also went up.

Up the Severn river the launches went until it widens into Round bay, and two miles farther to where Hopkins creek makes in. Here the party went ashore.

Mr. Knadler and his assistants had brought along six dogs, two axes, a horn, a lantern, a pair of climbing irons and a long line. The dogs, says Mr. Knadler, are the best coon dogs in the State.

Knadler's dogs are Ring and Singwell, typical coon dogs—not pretty nor of noble ancestry, but just coon dogs, and good ones. They live only to tree coons, and foxes and rabbits can cross their trail and they won't pay any attention to them.

A Tramp Through The Woods.

As soon as the 200 or so officers had gotten ashore they began to call Mr. Knadler "Pap," and the Britishers took up the name, and 'Pap" it was for the chief huntsman for the rest of the night. "Pap" knew his job and he hustled into the woods and got busy. The bunch followed him, and they made so much noise breaking through the brush that "Pap" knew every coon in Anne Arundel would skip out as soon as it heard the racket. The other huntsmen went on ahead with the dogs and "Pap" undertook to manage the crowd.

He would gladly do anything in the world for a naval officer, but when there's a coon to be treed there is nothing but coon for him. When he saw that the party in their eagerness would spoil his hunt he gently and firmly tried to keep them back. He wanted to do it in a hurry, for his associates had gone on ahead and he was afraid they would start a coon and he would be left out.

His efforts were unsuccessful, though, until one of his allies suggested that he take them through the brush and lose part of them. He started off and broke through a bank of ivy, but one of the Britishers followed him.

"Pap," he said, "I'm going to stick to you, and I know you'll look out for me."

Part of the crowd started to follow Knadler, but just then a house dog away off in the distance started to bark at the moon, and somebody yelled that the game had been started. The whole crowd set off in the direction of the noise, and when they arrived at the house the only animals in sight except the yelping dog were a pen full of pigs.

Meantime a dog treed a possum. One of the hunters climbed the tree and pushed the animal off and the dogs secured him. A Britisher instantly spoke for it and "Pap" had it caught and held. He told the officer he'd better muzzle the beast, and one of the bluejackets tied its jaws together tightly. The Britisher intended to take it out to the Drake and have a possum roast, and another suggestion that it be tamed for a mascot. Old "Pap" Knadnel smiled behind his hand at the thought of the fun there would be—for the possum.

In a little while the dogs started the trail of a coon. While the misled hunters were laughing at the joke on themselves they heard the deep melodious bay of the dogs hot on the scent. The sound carried away over the hills and there was music in it. At first faint, and then increasing in volume, it spread such a contagion of enthusiasm that everyone "piked" across country at top speed, breaking through thick underbrush and tripping up frequently.

The Coon Was Treed.

After a little while they heard shrill, exultant yelps, and some one passed the word that the coon was treed. Then the hunters got their second wind and broke through the thickets even faster.

When they got there the coon had been treed and the dogs were underneath carrying on high jinks. "Pap" had let the coon stay in the tree till the party arrived. Then he stepped out and gave a little advice.

"You-all want to see this here coon fight. Well, then, step back, make a circle, and don't make any noise. If you flurry them dogs the coon'll get away."

His audience were all officers and they know how to obey, and there was no noise, but a tense nervousness as one of the huntsmen went up the tree. They could see through the leaves of the big black body and sharp snout; they saw it run out to the end of the limb at the approach of the climber; they saw i pushed off and saw the glad, joyous action of the hounds.

There was hardly a sound as the coon struck the ground and the dogs jumped at it. It is a peculiarity of the coon that he will try his best to get away from one dog, but when there are half a dozen he sticks it out to the end. The combat was short but sharp before one of the hounds made his teeth meet in the throat of the quarry.

"Pap" was for starting off on another trail, but there were oysters roasting on big grates down by the river shore, and back they went. "Pap" went with them, but the other huntsman stayed back. When they reached the beach everybody started to enjoy the roasted oysters, until one of the Knadler boys came back and said that another coon had been treed about two miles off.

As some of the Britishers had not had the chance to get a good look at the first fight, they were for going off to see this one, and back into the woods went about half the party. When the man climbed up he said he called down that there were two coons there, and he pushed them down. They were young ones, and the dogs did for them in short order; then he called down that a third coon was in hiding, and when he went to the ground he met his finish.

Some time in the morning the officers reached their ships, but Knadler stayed behind to skin the game. The hides were presented the Britishers.

SIX BOYS WILL COST PARENTS $24,000.

The Newton Mentor: Some one has figured out that the average boy who is dependent upon his parents for a livelihood until he reaches the age of 21 years, costs them $4,000. Upon this basis of calculation a brood for instance, six boys, will represent an outlay of $24,000 by the time they leave the roost. The question naturally arises, does it pay to raise boys, and are there no other crops that would be more profitable! If a boy turns out to be a cigarette fiend with a laugh that would make the wild untutored donkey feel perfectly at home in his society, and with an untrammeled and unconquerable desire to avoid work, it is safe to say the parents might have invested to better advantages. But if the boy grows up with the lesson well learned that wealth and success grows only on bushes by the sweat of the brow, the parents need not begrudge whatever they have spent on him, for he will be a source of increasing joy and pride to their heart when they grow old and their hands tremble and their legs wabble and their steps are slow and faltering. They will then have two strong arms to lean upon.
