have wished to overset liberty, they shall be recalled and confined to their proper station.

Citizen soldiers, you whom we must censure to-day, but whom we must always admire, believe that liberty is here defended by your friends. The legislature is the citadel of the constitution. It is your duty to die for it and you are about to besiege it. Let its voice be always heard among you; and when you return to your firesides, you will find it cemented by your blood and covered with your triumphs.

Thibaudeau concluded by presenting the plan of two resolutions.

The first declared, "That all conspiracies or crimes against the constitution, the legislative body, and the directory, came under the jurisdiction of the criminal tribunal of the place where the legislature sits; that all persons accused should be denounced at the office of the public accuser, but that they should have the power of appealing from that tribunal; and in this case they should be carried before a court pointed out by the tribunal of Cassation." The second was, that every deliberation or common act expressed by the armed force, although nothing follow upon it, except the case determined by law, shall be a delect. That all addresses from one body of troops to another, or to the civil authorities, is an act of sedition. The plan then points out the penalties to be inflicted on the instigators, movers, or subscribers of addresses, according to the enormity of the case, and the different powers against which they shall be directed.

The gradation of offence is, first against the directory, then the legislative body, and last the law and constitution.
